Hiram R. Roberts was born in Somersworth (now Rollinsford), May 16, 1806. In 1820 his father died, leaving young Hiram the sole support of his widowed mother, whom he aided in the management of the farm and the maintenance of a family of younger children. Under these circumstances he was unable to gratify any desire he may have had for acquiring a liberal education; but he made the most, however, of the advantages afforded by the district school, and also found opportunity to attend the academy at South Berwick, Me. He secured a good English education, and qualified himself for teaching in the common schools, which occupation he followed for several winters, when farm-work did not require his presence at home. After coming of age he purchased the interest of the other children in the farm, and set out in earnest upon his life-work as a thorough and successful farmer; and it is but justice to add that Judge Roberts became one of the leading agriculturists in the State.

The original homestead was settled by Judge Roberts' great-grandfather in 1743, and has since remained in the family. He was one of the organizers of the Strafford County Agricultural Society, and was its first president. He was also a member of the State Board of Agriculture for Strafford County.

Judge Roberts was never a politician in the general sense of the term, although strongly interested in public affairs and thoroughly identified with the Democratic party, for whose success he always earnestly labored. He held the office of selectman, represented the town in the Legislature in 1837, and in 1839 was appointed by Governor Page associate justice of the Court of Common Pleas for Strafford County, then embracing Strafford, Belknap, and Carroll Counties. He held this position thirteen years, and in 1852 he was appointed by Governor Martin to the office of judge of probate, in which capacity he served until 1857. In 1875 he received the gubernatorial nomination, and in one of the closest political contests ever known in this State he received the largest vote ever cast for a Democratic candidate for Governor of New Hampshire, there being no choice by the people, and the vote of his opponent, Governor Cheney, being less than two hundred greater than his; but the Republicans having secured a small majority in the Legislature elected their candidate.

Judge Roberts was one of the incorporators of the Salmon Falls Bank and the Rollinsford Savings-Bank, and was president of both from their incorporation until his death, and was a most skillful and judicious financier. He manifested a decided interest in educational matters, and was school superintending committee several years. He regarded the claims of morality and religion, and his life throughout was a shining example of Christian faith and practice. For more than forty years he was a member of the Baptist Church at South Berwick, Me., and a large portion of that time superintendent of the Sabbath-school.

In November, 1831, he united in marriage with Miss Ruth Ham, daughter of John Ham, of Dover, and their family consisted of nine children.—John Ham, who resides on the old homestead; Stephen, deceased; Elizabeth, deceased; Edward H., deceased; Walter S. Hall, and Frank W., reside in Iowa; Susan J., is the wife of Samuel H. Rollins of this town; and Joseph Doe, who also is a resident of Rollinsford.

Judge Roberts was one of New Hampshire's most honored citizens, and his home was pre-eminently the abode of substantial New England comfort. His death occurred May 30, 1876, on the farm where he was born, and where several generations of the family had lived and died.

HON. EDWARD H. ROLLINS.

The Rollins family is one of the oldest and most numerous in the State. In Southeastern New Hampshire, from the seaboard to Lake Winnipiseogee, the Rollins name is prominent in the history of almost every town. Most if not all the representatives of the name in this region, and among them the subject of this sketch, are the descendants of James Rollins (or Rawlins, as the name was then and for a long time after spelled, and is now by some branches of the family), who came to America in 1632, with the first settlers of Ipswich, Mass., and who, ten or twelve years afterwards, located in that portion of old Dover known as "Bloody Point," now embraced in the town of Newington, where he died about 1690. The representatives of the family suffered their full share in the privations and sacrifices incident to the firm establishment of the colony, and performed generous public service in the early Indian and French wars and the great Revolutionary contest. Ichabod, the eldest son of James Rawlins, and of whom Edward H. is a lineal descendant, was waylaid and killed by a party of Indians while on the way from Dover to Oyster River (now Durham), with one John Bunker, May 22, 1707. Thomas, the second son of James, who subsequently became a resident of Exeter, was a member of the famous "dissolved Assembly" of 1683, who took up arms under Edward Gove and endeavor-ored to incite an insurrection against the tyrannical royal Governor, Cranfield. For this attempt Gove and others, including Thomas Rawlins, were presented for high treason. Gove was tried, convicted, and sentenced to death, but was subsequently pardoned. We do not learn, however, that any of the others were tried. Others of the family fell victims to the murderous malignity of the Indians.

There were from twenty-five to thirty descendants of James Rawlins, of the fourth and fifth generations, engaged in active service, and several of them in distinguished capacities, in the patriot cause during the Revolutionary war.

Among the first settlers of that portion of Dover which afterwards became Somersworth was Jeremiah Rollins, the only son of Ichabod, heretofore mentioned as slain by the Indians. He was one of the petitioners for the incorporation of Somersworth as a separate parish. He died a few years previous to the Revolution, leaving several daughters, but only one son, Ichabod Rollins, who became an active champion of the Revolutionary cause, was a member of the conventions at Exeter in 1775, and served as a member of the committee appointed to prepare a plan of providing ways and means for furnishing troops, and also as a member of the committee of supplies, the principal labor upon which was performed by himself and Timothy Walker, of Concord. He was a member of the convention which resolved itself into an independent State government Jan. 5, 1776, and served in the Legislature in October following. He was the first judge of probate under the new government, holding the office from 1776 to 1784. He was subsequently a member of the Executive Council, and died in 1800. From this eminent citizen the town of Rollinsford, formed from the portion of Somersworth in which he resided, received its name. He stands midway in a direct line of descent from James Rawlins to Edward H., the great-grandson of James, and great-grandfather of Edward H. He had four sons, of whom John, the oldest, was the grandfather of Hon. Daniel G. Rollins, who was judge of probate for the county of Strafford from 1857 to 1866, and whose son, Edward Ashton Rollins, was Speaker of the New Hampshire House of Representatives in 1861-62, commissioner of Internal Revenue under President Johnson, and is now president of the Centennial Bank at Philadelphia; and another son, Daniel G. Rollins, was recently district attorney, and is now surrogate of the city and county of New York. James Rollins, the third son of Ichabod, and grandfather of Edward H., settled upon the farm in Rollinsford, which has since remained the family homestead. He was the father of thirteen children, seven sons and six daughters. Of these, Daniel Rollins, the eighth child, born May 30, 1797, and who married Mary, eldest daughter of Ebenezer Plumer, of Rollinsford, was the father of Edward H. He succeeded to the homestead, but sold out and went to Maine with a view of making his home there. He soon returned and repurchased that part of the homestead lying east of the highway, and erected a dwelling opposite the old family mansion, where he lived a life of sturdy industry, rearing a family of six children, four sons and two daughters, and died Jan. 7, 1864.

Edward Henry Rollins, the oldest of the children, was born Oct. 3, 1824. He lived at home, laboring upon the farm in the summer season, attending the district school in winter, and getting an occasional term's attendance at the South Berwick Academy and Franklin Academy, in Dover, until seventeen years of age, when he went to Concord and engaged as druggist's clerk in the well-known apothecary-store of John McDaniel. He retained his situation some three or four years, industriously applying himself to the details of the business. He then went to Boston, where he was engaged in similar service until 1847, when, having thoroughly mastered the business, he returned to Concord and went into trade on his own account, soon building up a large and successful business. Having bought and improved the land on Main Street, just north of the Eagle Hotel, the great fire of 1851 destroyed the building, which he had but recently finished. He rebuilt the stores known as "Rollins' Block," one of which was occupied by his own business for so many years. This property he sold a short time since to the New Hampshire Savings-Bank.

In politics, Mr. Rollins was originally a Webster Whig, but voted for Franklin Pierce in 1852, and for Nathaniel B. Baker, the Democratic candidate for Governor, at the next March election. The aggressions of slavery, however, culminating in the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill and the repeal of the Missouri Compromise, dissolved his brief connection with the Democratic party. Strongly opposed to the extension of slavery or any measures rendering its extension possible, though he had previously taken no active part in politics, he enlisted in the American or Know-Nothing movement in the winter of 1854-55, with the hope that it might, as it did, prove instrumental in the defeat of the Democracy.

From this time Mr. Rollins was an active politician. He labored effectively in perfecting the new party organization, taking therein the liveliest interest. At the March election, 1855, he was chosen to the Legislature from Concord, and served efficiently in that body as a member of the Judiciary Committee. The next year witnessed the merging of the American party in the new Republican party, which object Mr. Rollins was largely instrumental in securing. Re-elected to the Legislature in March, 1856, Mr. Rollins was chosen Speaker of the House, ably discharging the duties of the office, and was re-elected the following year. The talent which he had already developed as a political organizer made his services eminently desirable as a campaign manager, and he was made chairman of the first State Central Committee of the Republican party, a position which he held continuously until his election to Congress in 1861, and in which he exhibited a capacity for thorough organization, a mastery of campaign work, in general and in detail, seldom equaled and certainly never surpassed.

He was chairman of the New Hampshire delegation in the Republican National Convention at Chicago in 1860, having been chosen a delegate at large by the State Convention, with but a single vote in opposition. In the close contest between the friends of Lincoln and Seward in that convention the New Hampshire delegation, under his lead, supported Lincoln from the first, and was strongly instrumental in securing his nomination.

In 1861, Mr. Rollins was elected to Congress from the Second District over the Democratic candidate, the late Chief Justice Samuel D. Bell. He was re-elected in 1863 over Col. John H. George, and in 1865 over Hon. Lewis W. Clark, now associate justice of the Supreme Court. Mr. Rollins' congressional career covered the exciting period of the late civil war and subsequent reconstruction, and he was throughout a zealous supporter of the most advanced Republican measures, such as the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia and the thirteenth and fourteenth amendments to the Constitution, abolishing slavery throughout the Union, conferring citizenship and civil rights upon colored men, fixing the basis of representation in Congress upon all citizens without regard to color or previous condition, imposing political disabilities upon such civil and military officers of the government as had violated their oaths by engaging in the Rebellion, declaring the involability of the public debt, and prohibiting forever the payment of that incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States. To this entire policy Mr. Rollins gave a most earnest support, and took part zealously and efficiently in all the important legislation of those days. He was an industrious member of the committees to which he was assigned, serving on the Committee on the District of Columbia, as chairman of the Committee on Accounts, and a member of the Committee on Public Expenditures, by which latter committee, during his service, a vast amount of labor was performed, especially in the investigation of the management of the New York and Boston custom-houses, involving the operations of the "blockade runners" during the war. He was also, on account of his well-known parliamentary knowledge and skill, frequently called to the chair to preside over the House on turbulent occasions.

In view of Mr. Rollins' subsequent intimate connection with the Union Pacific Railroad Company, it is proper to remark that in Congress he was a firm opponent of, and voted against, the measure adopted in July, 1864, doubling the land grant of this company, and making the government security a second instead of a first mortgage upon the road. In 1869 he was chosen secretary and assistant treasurer of the Union Pacific Railroad, having for some time previous, after the expiration of his congressional service, acted as agent of the company at Washington in the transaction of business with the government, especially in receiving the subsidy bonds. In 1871 he was elected secretary and treasurer, and officiated as such in the office of the company at Boston until March, 1877, though retaining his residence at Concord, and devoting considerable attention to New Hampshire politics. He had, after retiring from Congress, been again called to the chairmanship of the State Committee, and served from 1868 to 1871, inclusive, with his usual ability and success. As chairman of the committee, and ex-officio commander-in-chief of the Republican forces in New Hampshire for ten years, he was a tireless worker,—the very incarnation of energy and persistent industry. He had a genius for political organization and warfare. His vigor and magnetism surmounted all obstacles and swept away all opposition. His enthusiasm was contagious. Undaunted by suggestions of danger or defeat, he inspired all around him with his own indomitable courage and spirit. This was the secret of his extraordinary power, as it ever is in the world's affairs, and made him master of every field where he contended.

Mr. Rollins' name was presented by his friends for United States senator in 1866, when Hon. James W. Patterson was nominated and elected; in 1870, when Senator Cragin was re-elected; and again in 1873, when the choice fell upon Hon. Bainbridge Wadleigh. At the expiration of Senator Cragin's second term, in 1876, Mr. Rollins was nominated by the Republican caucus, and elected as his successor for the full term of six years, commencing in March, 1877. He took his seat in the Senate at the extra session, in the spring of 1877, and was assigned to the Committees on the District of Columbia, Contingent Expenses, and Manufactures, being for a time chairman of the latter. He is now a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, on the District of Columbia, on Retrenchment and Reform in the Civil Service, on Enrolled Bills, and is chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. As a senator he has exhibited constantly his peculiar traits of industry, energy, and fidelity to duty. Engaging in debate less than some other senators, and never parading before the country for effect, he yet speaks on all proper occasions, and always to the business in hand, and with characteristic force, point, and effectiveness. He is seldom absent from his seat, responds to every roll-call, and but few questions have arisen since his service began on which his vote is not recorded. It is a noteworthy fact that during more than five years' service in the Senate he has been absent but two days when both branches of Congress were in session, and then was sick in bed with malarial fever. No senator has a clearer or cleaner record in this respect. His devotion to his State and constituents is very marked. Every letter is answered, every call responded to, and every New Hampshire man dwelling in or visiting Washington is treated by him with courtesy, and his business with the government carefully attended to and furthered by his active assistance. Among the measures of special interest to the people of New Hampshire in which he has taken a leading part are those for the relief of savings-banks from national taxation, and appropriations for the improvement of Cochecho, Exeter, and Lamprey Rivers. At the session of 1881-82, Senator Rollins, by untiring effort, secured a liberal appropriation for the erection of a national building at Concord, the capital of the State. No senator in the chamber gives more assiduous attention to the work of the committees, where measures are matured, or has a more useful influence upon general legislation; and his friends feel a just pride in the fact that in a somewhat venal and very suspicious age his name is untainted by any schemes of corruption or jobbery, or scandals touching the use of public money.

Such are the outlines of Mr. Rollins' conspicuous public career. His influence may be truly summarized by saying that during the last twenty-five years no man in New Hampshire has been more prominently known in the politics of the State, and well-informed men in all parties concede that the Republican party owes more for its almost unbroken successes in the closely-contested elections from 1856 to the present time to his labors in the committee, in Congress, and before the people than to those of any other man.

Mr. Rollins was active in the organization of the First National Bank at Concord, a large stockholder, and a member of the first board of directors, but withdrew and disposed of his stock some time since. He sold his drug business at Concord to his brother, John F. Rollins, many years ago, when his congressional and other duties required his entire attention. The latter also has since disposed of the business, and now resides upon Fort George Island, at the mouth of St. John's River, on the coast of Florida, of which Senator Rollins is the proprietor. This island is a most romantic locality, and is the subject of a very interesting illustrated sketch in Scribner's Magazine, by Julia B. Dodge. It embraces twelve hundred acres of land, and is admirably adapted to orange-raising, and is under cultivation for that purpose. The climate is delightful, far superior to that of the mainland, and Mr. John F. Rollins, by a long residence there, finds his health much improved.

Mr. Rollins was united in marriage, Feb. 13, 1849, with Miss Ellen E. West, daughter of John West, of Concord. Her mother, Mrs. West, was the daughter of Gen. John Montgomery, a prominent citizen of Haverhill, well known in public affairs. To this union have been born five children,—Edward W., born Nov. 25, 1850; Mary Helen, Sept. 4, 1853; Charles Montgomery, Feb. 27, 1856; Frank West, Feb. 24, 1860; Montgomery, Aug. 25, 1867. The second son, Charles Montgomery, died at the age of five years. The other children survive. The eldest son, Edward W., is a graduate of the Institute of Technology at Boston, and was for five years the engineer and cashier of the Colorado Central Railroad. He is married, and now engaged in business as a banker in Denver, Col. Mary Helen, the only daughter, is married to Henry Robinson, a lawyer, and prominent member of the present Legislature, and resides in Concord. Frank W., the second surviving son, after prosecuting a three years' course at the Institute of Technology, attended the Harvard Law School, and is now about completing his legal studies in the office of Hon. John Y. Mugridge, at Concord. Montgomery, the youngest son, is fitting for college. It will thus be seen that Mr. Rollins believes in practical education for his sons.

Retaining his home in Concord, where he has always lived the greater portion of the year, Mr. Rollins has for several years past had his summer home at the old place in Rollinsford, where he was reared, and which came into his possession after the death of his father in 1864. Here he has made many improvements, and brought the land into a superior state of cultivation. He thoroughly repaired and remodeled the house some six years ago, and made it a very attractive summer residence. In the spring of 1881, however, while he was absent in Washington, the house and all the buildings on the farm, with most of their contents, were completely destroyed by fire. Without delay Mr. Rollins proceeded to rebuild, and has erected a very large and finely-appointed barn and stable, with carriage-house, ice-house, and other buildings; and a fine house, on the old site, is very near completion. The house is in the Queen Anne style, most conveniently arranged, and finished principally in hard native woods, with ornamental fire-places, elaborately carved fire-frames, and frescoed ceilings. It is heated by steam and lighted by gas, has hot and cold water conveniences, spacious halls, and is fitted up with every modern improvement. In a few weeks it will be ready for occupation, and will be one of the most beautiful dwellings in this region, combining all the substantial conveniences of a farmhouse and an elegant home for summer and winter also. The place is located but little more than a mile from the city of Dover, where Mr. Rollins goes for post-office and other business accommodations, so that in the summer-time he is regarded as a Dover citizen. Telephonic communication has been established between his house and the telegraph-office in Dover. Mr. Rollins' mother is still living, at an advanced age, at her old home, and her youngest daughter, Miss Elizabeth W. Rollins, resides with her.

In religious faith Mr. Rollins was reared a Congregationalist, and when in Rollinsford he attends worship at the old First Parish Church in Dover, where Rev. Dr. Spalding officiates. Mrs. Rollins is an Episcopalian, and in Concord the family attend upon the services of the St. Paul's Episcopal Church.

He has long been a member of the Masonic fraternity, of the Blazing Star Lodge, Trinity Chapter, and Mount Horeb Commandery, at Concord, of which he has been Eminent Commander.

Mr. Rollins is very fond of agricultural pursuits, and works on his farm in the haying and harvesting seasons, with great benefit to himself physically. Though constitutionally not very strong, and of a highly nervous temperament, his excellent personal habits, his rural tastes and simplicity of life, have enabled him to do a prodigious amount of work without suffering anything beyond an occasional derangement of health, always restored by relaxation from official duties and physical labor on the farm, where he was wont to take similar exercise in boyhood. He is now in the full vigor and strength of his powers, and may reasonably look forward to many years more of active usefulness to the State and nation.

AUGUSTUS ROLLINS.

The name of Rollins, or Rawlins, as it was once written, is one of the most ancient in the history of England, and has been a fixed surname for more than five hundred years. It is an old family in Cornwall, and more ancient still in Hertfordshire, where persons of the name were for many generations officially connected with the principal city of that county, and they have spread into almost every county in England, as well as to Ireland, Scotland, and America. The earliest mention of the name which has been found dates back to 1363, when Gilbert Rawlin, or Rawlyn, was vicar of Marshworth, in Buckinghamshire. He exchanged this for the vicarage of Kensington, where he remained until 1370.

The family in this country traces its ancestry to James Rawlins, who came from Ipswich, England, in 1632, and settled in Dover, living on the ancient Rollins homestead in what is now Newington.

The father of the subject of this memoir, Hiram Rollins, was descended from the emigrant James as follows: The emigrant's son Ichabod was father of Jeremiah, whose son Ichabod was many years a judge; Judge Ichabod's son John was father of Hiram.

Capt. Hiram Rollins was for many years a successful shipmaster. Dec. 4, 1790, he married Joanna, daughter of Paul, and granddaughter of Col. John Wentworth. His second wife was Mary H. (Noble) Simes, of Portsmouth, whom he married Jan. 21, 1804. During a portion of his life he took considerable interest in the militia of the State, and was aide to Maj.-Gen. Samuel Hale, Second Division New Hampshire militia, in 1808. He died at Somersworth (now Rollinsford), Aug. 24, 1843, aged seventy-six years.

Augustus Rollins, the subject of this memoir, was born in the part of Somersworth now set off as Rollinsford, Aug. 29, 1797. Early in life he manifested a decided interest in agricultural pursuits, and became one of the leading farmers and progressive agriculturists in the State. He was ever mindful of the welfare of his native town, and labored zealously to promote its interests. He held the various town offices, and also represented Rollinsford in the Legislature. It may truly be said that he was one of the most active and influential citizens of the town. He was a Republican in politics, and very energetic during the late Rebellion, contributing liberally in both time and money to the cause.

May 24, 1824, he united in marriage with Abiah Winkley, of Barrington, N. H., and their family consisted of the following: Samuel Winkley, Oliver E., Augustus W., Mary, Ellen, and Lydia Hale, all of whom survive except Ellen and Augustus W.

Samuel W., who graduated at Dartmouth in 1846, is a lawyer, and judge of probate of Belknap County, residing at Meredith village. He is a prominent citizen of that county, and has been county solicitor and United States assistant assessor. He read law with Hon. Charles W. Woodman, and later with the late Hon. Daniel M. Christie, one of the Nestors of the bar, and commenced practice in Farmington in 1849, and in Meredith village in 1855, where he has since resided. He married Mary A., daughter of the late Dr. D. T. Livy, of Wolfborough, N. H.

Col. Augustus W. entered the Union service Nov. 7, 1861, as captain of Company F, Seventh New Hampshire Regiment. He was promoted to major July 23, 1863; to lieutenant-colonel Sept. 30, 1864; and was subsequently breveted colonel, and at the close of the war was commissioned colonel of the Second New Hampshire Regiment, which office he held at the time of his death. He was a brave and gallant officer, and participated in the battles of Olustee, Fla., Chester Hill, Drury's Bluff, Deep Run, Newmarket Heights (under the fortifications of Richmond his horse was shot under him, and was severely injured by the fall), Laurel Hill, Darbytown road, two assaults on Forts Wagner and Gregg in the bloody days in front of Petersburg, and at the storming of Fort Fisher. It was for gallantry at this contest that he was breveted colonel. Col. Rollins was a member of the Legislature in 1869. He died Feb. 16, 1870. The three surviving sisters occupy the old homestead. Mrs. Rollins died Feb. 24, 1881.

WILLIAM H. MORTON.

William H. Morton, son of William and Sarah Griffith Morton, was born in Portsmouth, N. H., Feb. 14, 1814. He remained in his native town until 1823, when his parents removed to Salmon Falls, and young William's education, which was begun in Portsmouth, was completed at South Berwick Academy. He pursued his studies with diligence and attention, and succeeded in acquiring an education that well qualified him for his subsequent successful business career.

In 1830 he went into the Salmon Falls Manufacturing Company's employ to learn the art of wool-sorting, where he remained four years. In 1834 the mills were destroyed by fire, and young Morton then went to Massachusetts, and commenced work in a woolen-mill at Grafton, where he remained about two years, and then engaged in the mercantile business in the same town. In 1842 he removed to Blackstone, Mass., and began trading, which he continued until 1845, when he returned to Salmon Falls, and opened a store in this town. He continued in the mercantile business here until the organization of the Salmon Falls Bank, in 1854, when he disposed of his business and became cashier of the bank, a position which he has held to the present time, a period of over thirty years. He was also one of the incorporators and trustees of the Rollinsford Savings-Bank, and has been its secretary and treasurer from its organization to the present time.

Mr. Morton is one of the most active and influential citizens of the town, and the confidence in which he is held by his fellow-townsmen is evidenced by the fact that he has held the office of town treasurer since the incorporation of Rollinsford in 1849, clerk since 1853, and justice of the peace since 1857. He was also selectman of the town of Somersworth two years (before Rollinsford was set off), and has been selectman of Rollinsford three years. In all these various offices which he has been called upon to occupy, he has discharged the duties with eminent credit to himself and to the entire satisfaction of his constituents. Politically he is a Republican, and attends the Congregational Church.

In 1841 he united in marriage with Sarah P. Merriam, a native of Grafton, Mass., and their family consisted of three children, only one of whom is living, — Etta, widow of John Merriam. Mrs. Morton died in 1849, and in 1851 he married Armine Leavitt, a native of York, Me., and their family consisted of the following: Frederick H., deceased; William A., a resident of Portland, Me.; and Sarah J., now attending school at Exeter, N. H. Mr. Morton's second wife died in 1866, and in 1867 he united in marriage with Mary Shackford, a native of Portsmouth, N. H.

JOSHUA CONVERSE.

The Converse family traces its ancestry back to the sixteenth century. The original seat of the family was in Navarre, France, from whence was Roger de Coigniers, who emigrated to England near the end of the reign of William the Conqueror, and to whom the Bishop of Durham gave the constableness of Durham. Among his descendants, Conyers, of Horden, Durham, was created a baronet July 14, 1628. Sir Humphry, the eighth generation, wrote the name Coigniers, and Sir Christopher, the twentieth generation, adopted the orthography of Conyers.

In Navarre, in the sixteenth century, the residence of a family of this name was known as the Chateau de Coigniers. Those bearing the name were Huguenots, and in the massacre on St. Bartholomew's Day, in 1572, many of the family fell victims to the rage of the Papists, and Pierre Coigniers, who was attached to the court of Henry IV., of France, having witnessed the assassination of his kinsman, Admiral Coligny, and fearful of his own safety, escaped with his wife and two infants to England, and settled in the county of Essex, where his son married a lady of considerable possessions in that and an adjoining county. It was Ralph, a son of this marriage, who was created a baronet by King Charles II. The name has passed through various modifications from Coigniers, Conyers, Convers, and Converse.

The Converse family in this country dates its ancestry to Deacon Edward Converse, or Converse, who arrived in New England in the fleet with Governor Winthrop, in 1630, and settled in Charlestown.

Joshua Converse, the subject of this sketch, son of Joshua and Polly Piper Converse, was born in Rindge, N. H., June 15, 1813. In early life he engaged in the manufacture of cotton fabrics, and was superintendent of the Suffolk corporation, of Lowell, several years. In 1859 he removed to Salmon Falls, N. H., and accepted the appointment of agent, in which position he was eminently successful. While a resident of Lowell he was a member of the Massachusetts Legislature, and of the common council and board of aldermen. He was a director and subsequent president of the Traders' and Mechanics' Insurance Company, a director of the Prescott Bank, and a trustee of the Lowell Five-Cent Savings-Bank, from the organization of these associations until he removed from Lowell. Since 1869 he has been a director of the Salmon Falls Bank, and vice-president of the Rollinsford Savings-Bank. In the discharge of these important trusts, and in the management of the business of an extensive manufacturing corporation, the ability and integrity of Mr. Converse have commanded the unqualified respect of his associates.

In 1875 Mr. Converse purchased a tract of land on the eastern slope of Garrison Hill, and erected a residence and here intended to pass the remainder of his days in retirement. But having pursued an active life from an early day, he found inactivity irksome, and so purchased a wharf in Dover, and established a lumber business. This business from a small beginning has increased from year to year until at the present time the annual sales amount to one hundred thousand dollars. In 1879, Charles C. Hobbs became associated with him, and the business is now conducted under the firm-name of Converse & Hobbs. Mr. Converse is one of the leading citizens of Rollinsford, and represented that town in the Legislature in 1877 and 1878; Republican in politics.

Oct. 18, 1835, he united in marriage with Jane B., daughter of Galen and Jane Barker Damon, and their family consisted of three children, a son and two daughters, only one of whom survives,—Mary Jane, wife of James A. Place, of South Berwick, Me.; William Henry, and Josephine (deceased). Mrs. Converse died March 4, 1868, and Aug. 30, 1869, he married H. Jennie Dearborn, daughter of Joseph and Harriet (Drew) Dearborn.

WILLIAM R. GARVIN.

The Garvin family date their ancestry in this country to James Garvin, who came from Ireland and settled in what is now the town of Rollinsford in about the year 1700. He was a sea-captain and an active man of that day. He built a store at what is now known as the lower landing, where he sold West India goods. A son, Thomas, was the grandfather of the subject of this sketch.

William R. Garvin, son of Samuel and Susan Roberts Garvin, was born on the premises he now occupies in the town of Rollinsford, March 15, 1830. His early education was obtained at the common schools, and he subsequently attended the Berwick Academy, and later we find him teaching school during the winter and working on the farm during the summer season. Reared on the farm, he soon manifested a laudable ambition to excel in agricultural pursuits, and he has kept pace with the progress of the age. He was an active member of the old agricultural society, and labored earnestly in its behalf. Mr. Garvin has also manifested an interest in improving the stock of this region, and is known as a successful breeder of the celebrated Ayrshire cattle. Systematic, energetic, and possessed of progressive ideas, he ranks among the most successful agriculturists of the town of Rollinsford, well known as one of the best and most attractive agricultural sections in this old commonwealth. Mr. Garvin is ranked among the substantial citizens of the town, and has held the various town offices, such as selectman, school committee, etc., and during the last election was the candidate of his party for county commissioner. He is Democratic in politics, and an earnest advocate of the principles of that party. In religious matters he also takes a deep interest; is a member of the Baptist Church at South Berwick, Me.; is active in the Sabbath-school, and for a long time was one of its officers.

April 2, 1862, he united in marriage with Frances H. Yeaton, a native of Rollinsford, and their family consists of seven children, three sons and four daughters,—Annie Bertha, Clara W., William R., Susie, Homer, Gertrude, and Samuel R.

On his maternal side Mr. Garvin traces his lineage to the Wentworth family, his mother, Susan, born April 19, 1804, being the daughter of Deborah Wentworth Roberts, who was the daughter of Bartholomew and Ruth Hall Wentworth. Mrs. Garvin is a sister of the late Judge Hiram Roberts, of this town. Samuel, father of William R., was born in Rollinsford, Sept. 12, 1804.

LORENZO STACKPOLE.

Lorenzo Stackpole is a descendant of Joshua Stackpole; married, in 1749, Lucy Baker; settled in Somersworth (now Rollinsford). His ancestors came from Sligo, Ireland, and they named that part of Somersworth where they settled Sligo, and the name clings to that locality to-day.

Joshua's second wife was Abigail Hobbs. He was the father of thirteen children. Three of the first wife's sons were sea-captains at one time. Andrew was lost at sea.

Tobias, the youngest son of the second wife, was born August, 1766, in Somersworth. He married, when in his twentieth year, Eunice Roberts. He settled in Somersworth, near St. Alban's Cove, on the banks of the Piscataqua. They had twelve children, eight lived and were married. Nearly all had children.

Tobias Stackpole was a sea-captain. He died of a fever in his fifty-third year.

Moses, the sixth child, married Nancy Leighton, of Somersworth. They settled in Somersworth, near Great Falls.

They had three children,—Lorenzo, the eldest, was born Sept. 21, 1824. He married, Nov. 7, 1849, Elvira C. Wentworth, of Rollinsford (Rollinsford was taken from Somersworth, and incorporated July 3, 1849). They settled in South Berwick, Me. They had Annie Wentworth, born Dec. 10, 1850; Edgar C., born May 1, 1852, died Aug. 24, 1852.

Lorenzo bought a farm in the lower part of Rollinsford, near the home of his ancestors, moved there in July, 1858. He has made milk business a specialty.

Annie W. married, first, Joshua H. Lame, of New Jersey, July 6, 1869. He died Sept. 10, 1869; second, Bernhard Baer, of Germany, Jan. 3, 1872. They had Lorenzo E., born July 10, 1876, in Rollinsford.

THE town of Somersworth lies in the southeastern part of Strafford County, and is bounded as follows: on the north by Rochester, on the east by Salmon Falls River, which separates it from Maine, on the south by Rollinsford and Dover, and on the west by Dover. The surface is rolling, and the soil generally fertile.

The territory embraced within the present town of Somersworth was settled some time after Wabbron began the settlement of Cocceho Lower Falls (1640), probably about the year 1670, at or near Humphrey's (now Hussey's) Pond. The people gradually pushed farther and farther into the wilderness. The Heard family had commenced a clearing and built a garrison northwest of Varney's (now Garrison) Hill. Others found their way still farther into the north of Dover, seldom going beyond two or three miles from a garrison-house, to which they could fly in time of peril. About 1675 a family settled two miles north of Salmon Falls, on the Indigo Hill road, and tradition says they built a garrison.

During the earlier Indian wars Somersworth experienced very little of the desolating effects that befell her other more populous neighbors. The Indians roamed the country in small bands, and on their way to some larger community often attacked the lonely farm-houses lying in their track. George and Martin Ricker, Jabez Garland, and Gershum Downs are mentioned among those who fell victims to the prowling savages.

Ebenezer Downs, a Quaker, living on Indigo Hill, who, like his brethren, refused to arm himself or seek protection from the savages, was captured, taken to Canada, and sold with a number of others. Around the camp-fires at night the Indians gathered, and for pastime brought forth their prisoners to dance. On their way to Canada, Friend Downs refused to gratify their desires, and consequently was subjected to ill usage. He was taken by the same band that captured the family of John Hanson, of Knox-Marsh, in Dover, and the following summer Mr. Hanson redeemed his family, together with Mr. Downs.

It was about 1750 that Andrew Horn came from Dover and purchased the land where Great Falls is now located, erected a house near the present site of the Boston and Maine Railroad depot, and shortly afterwards a saw- and grist-mill at the falls. Those who had explored this region years before had returned with glowing accounts of the beauty of the scenery and of the magnificence of a fall, where the water dashed from ledge to ledge down a distance of a hundred feet or more, and from its being the largest on the Salmon Falls River they termed it the "great falls," hence the origin of the name of one of the most beautiful villages in New England.

In 1772 a new meeting-house was ordered to be built, and a committee appointed "to see to ye Building Thereof." (The reader must bear it in mind that the meeting-house, the "training-lot," and the centre of business was by the graveyard, near the present location of Rollinsford Junction. For a more thorough account, see history of Rollinsford, in this work.) Among the men who took an active part in the public business of the town at that time were Hon. John Wentworth, Hon. Ichabod Rollins, Dr. Moses Carr (for many years town clerk), Lieut. Yeaton, Joshua Roberts, Thomas Stackpole, Richard Philpot, and their beloved pastor, Rev. James Pike.

From the conclusion of the French and Indian wars to the opening of the Revolution the history of Somersworth was one of uninteresting progression. From a few scattering farms in a wilderness she had sprung up into a populous town. The first breath of wind that bore the news of the tyrannical acts of the mother-country to the hills of New Hampshire stirred the blood of the hitherto quiet people of Somersworth. The colonists had been cradled in warfare by their many bloody fights with the savages, and again the time had come that would test their courage, for their liberty, that was as dear as life, was at stake. Two delegates—John Wentworth and Ichabod Rollins—were elected by a general town-meeting to represent the town in the provincial "Congress" at Exeter, and to unite with men from other towns in the State in sending a delegate to the General Congress then summoned at Philadelphia. Somersworth was requested to raise, by subscription or otherwise, four pounds, as her share of a fund to defray the expenses of the delegates to Philadelphia and back; more than the amount required was subscribed in a short time. For the long struggle that followed Somersworth was found ready, and in her full proportion of men and means was embarked. True, there were some who opposed the measures of the colonists, but they were usually overpowered. At one time a vote to give a bounty of six dollars to those who enlisted was defeated at a town-meeting, but soon after another meeting was called, and the vote passed by a large majority. Friday, April 21, 1775, nearly the whole population of the town gathered at their little meeting-house and "voted that twenty men immediately march from town to meet the enemy, and those who shall go shall have wages." We can imagine those twenty brave fellows gathered on the "training-lot," with tearful eyes, bidding their friends adieu, and we follow them with our mind's eye over the winding roads,—through Dover, through Durham, Newmarket, and Exeter,—and we see others grasping the musket and joining the ranks until it had swelled to hundreds, and we lose sight of them as they disappear in the smoke of the battle. Afterwards the town voted ten dollars bounty; again, twenty dollars; and still again, before the close of the war, thirty dollars were offered to those who would enlist. At those times of contracted currency these were very liberal sums. The town furnished more than fifty men during the war.

Nothing worth recording occurred in Somersworth from the close of the Revolution to 1820. In this year Isaac Wendell came from Dover, built a mill, and began the manufacture of cotton goods. Three years after the Great Falls Manufacturing Company was incorporated the old mill was sold, torn down, and taken to Farmington. The new company under the direction of Mr. Wendell purchased a tract of land of Gershom Horn, erected several new mills, and commenced manufacturing cotton and woolen goods. At that time two houses only stood on the present site of Great Falls.

Incorporation of a Parish.—In 1729 the following petition was presented by the inhabitants in the north-eastern part of Dover for the formation of a new parish:

To his Excellency William Burnet Esqr. Captain General and Governour in Cheif in and over his Majesties province of New Hamp<sup>t</sup> the Honourable his Majesties Council and the Representatives of the s<sup>d</sup> province in General Assembly Convened.

The Petition of the Subscribers Inhabitants of the North East part of the Town of Dover, humbly sheweth—That the Dwelling places of yo<sup>r</sup> Petitioners are at a great distance from the houses of the Public Worship of God in the Town of Dover where your Petitioners live by which their attendance thereon is rendered very difficult more especially to the women and children of their families and that in the Winter Season and in Stormy weather so y<sup>t</sup> they cannot pay that Honour and Worship to God in publick as it is their hearts desire they could, therefore for the advancing the Interest of Religion and for the Accommodation of yo<sup>r</sup> Petitioners It is humbly prayed by them that Your Excellency and the Honourable Assembly will please to sett them off as a Parrish for the Maintaining the Public worship of God amongst themselves and that they be dismiss'd from the Town of Dover as to the Supporting of the Settled Minister there, And that the Bounds of that their Parish may begin at the Gulf a place so called at Cochecho river, and from thence to run to Varney's Hill and from thence the Town bounds on a North West point of the Compass & Your Petitioners Shall ever Pray as in duty bound &c

It appears that the appointed day passed but Dover had not been notified. The matter, therefore, on the 1st of May was deferred until "the 8 inst May or if the assembly be not then sitting, then to appear the 24 day of the sitting of next Genl assembly."

No action appears to have taken place on the 8th of May, but on the 14th "Dover petition was Read and the Parties heard by their Council, and an order made for a Committee to go on the spot and view the several Districts and Settle a Dividing line according to the best of their judgments and then the Petitioners in the mean time be free from being Rated to the ministers at the old Town &c, and the majr part agreeing shall be accounted sufficient to make returns at the Next session—for Confirmation."

The act was passed Dec. 19, 1729.

Incorporation of Town.—May 19, 1743, a petition was presented that the parish be made a town, but it was not until April 29, 1754, that the act of incorporation was passed. It retained the name of the parish, and Thomas Wallingford, Esq., Capt. John Wentworth, and Moses Stevens were appointed to call the first meeting of the voters.

CHAPTER CIV.

MANUFACTURING INTERESTS.

The Great Falls Manufacturing Company—The Great Falls Wooden Company—The Somersworth Machine Company—The Gas Company.

The Great Falls Manufacturing Company was incorporated June 11, 1823, with a chartered capital of $500,000.

The first meeting of the corporation was held at Dover, July 10, 1823, a board of directors was elected, and Abraham Wendell was chosen president, and Jacob Wendell treasurer.

Isaac Wendell, of Dover, from 1821 to 1823 purchased the privileges at the Great Falls, and also large tracts of land adjoining the privileges on both sides of the Salmon Falls River, with the view of establishing cotton-mills on the stream, and at the time the organization of the company was completed, had erected a store, carding-houses, work-shops suitable for building cotton machinery, and a wooden building for a cotton-factory near the present site of the flouring-mill.

For the property which Wendell had acquired by purchase, and improved, and a contract to complete by the following January 1280 cotton-spindles, with all other necessary machinery complete for manufacturing cotton goods, at $25 per spindle, the company voted, July 22d, to pay him $76,224.18, and Wendell to be the resident agent of the corporation.

George Trott was chosen treasurer in 1824, when a second cotton-factory of 4000 spindles was built, which is the upper section of the present No. 1 mill.

The following year a woolen-mill was built, capable of producing 200 yards daily of fine broadcloths. This mill was built easterly and at right angles with the present repair-shop. In the upper portion of the latter was woven carpetings, the lower story being used for a woolen-picker and dyeing-house.

Christopher C. Walcott was chosen superintendent of the woolen department.

The works were enlarged from the original plan, and the carpet-mill produced 200 yards daily, and the woolen-mill 400 yards of broad-cloths.

Large sums of money were expended in experiments, and although it does not appear that this branch of the company's manufactures was profitable, its fabrics were very fine, and compared favorably in texture, color, and finish with the best importations of that time.

In 1826 the charter was amended, authorizing a capital of $1,000,000.

The two lower sections of the now No. 2 mill were erected, and machinery was put into the lower section only the following year. The upper section was not filled with machinery until two years later, it being used in the mean time as a place of worship by the Congregationalists.

The company's charter was further amended in 1827, authorizing a capital of $1,500,000, which is the present nominal capital.

In 1831, Lloyd W. Wells succeeded Mr. Wendell as agent. The manufacture of carpets was discontinued in 1833, and in January, 1834, the business continuing unprofitable, the directors were authorized to stop the manufacture of all woolen goods.

George H. Kuhn was appointed treasurer, and Robert W. Israel agent in 1834.

The woolen business was entirely closed up, the goods on hand and machinery sold prior to July, 1835, and the mill was equipped with cotton machinery.

The machinery from the old "Wendell" mill was transferred to it, the mill itself sold and removed in 1838; also, owing to a lack of power on the upper level, some of the machinery from the other mills was transferred to this mill, and the balance of the mill supplied with new spindles to the amount of 5700.

To this time all the mills had been operated by power on the first level, and the lower fall had not been utilized, but to run the new mill a dam was built in 1835, nearly opposite the present cloth-room, and the water conducted through a long wooden pen-stock to three breast-wheels about two hundred and fifty feet easterly of the woolen mill, or No. 4, as it was then called, and by a system of belting the power was transmitted.

With this mill complete there were 39,840 spindles and 1192 looms.

In 1835 the dam at Mast Point was built, and the dam at Milton was raised four feet. The first created a new reservoir within two miles of the mills, capable of storing a day's water, and the latter increased the area of the Milton Ponds about five hundred acres.

In 1838 John A. Burleigh was appointed agent, and in 1840 Patrick T. Jackson succeeded to the office of treasurer.

Under his administration the condition of the company improved rapidly.

The reservoirs were increased in 1841 by the purchase of Cook's and Lovell's Ponds. The plan to fully and economically use the water on the second level was carried into effect by building a dam on the present site in 1842, and the discontinuance of the system of long belts, by which a large percentage of power was lost.

In 1842 the lower or southerly section of the present No. 3 mill was built, and in the following year the "woolen" mill was taken down and rebuilt, and is the upper or northerly section of No. 3.

The new No. 1 mill was commenced in October, 1845, and completed in 1847. In the mean time the dam on the third level was built, it being the privilege now leased to the Great Falls Woolen Company.

Mr. Jackson died in September, 1847.

During his administration the product of the looms had more than doubled, 25,000 spindles had been added, and of the five mills two had been built new and one rebuilt, and the two others put in the best order and condition.

John Clark succeeded to the office.

In 1849-50 the old No. 1 was filled with new machinery, the best then obtainable adapted for the spinning of No. 50 yarns. A turbine-wheel displaced the old breast-wheels, and a one hundred and eighty horse-power engine added.

Robert Hooper became treasurer in 1851. The bleachery was built the following year and gas-works erected. The reservoirs were increased by the purchase of Borne's and Wilson's Ponds.

In 1855 the middle section of the present No. 3 was built, and equipped with 7427 spindles and 200 looms, which were put in operation January, 1856.

In 1859 Mr. Hooper resigned and Daniel N. Spooner was appointed in his place, at which time the company had seven mills, 83,120 spindles, and 2120 looms.

In 1861 J. A. Burleigh died, after twenty-three years of faithful and efficient service; his son George W. was appointed to fill the vacancy. The mills were closed the greater portion of the time from 1862 to 1864.

In 1864 the reservoir for fire purposes and daily use at the mills was constructed at a cost of $100,000; it has a capacity of 1,700,000 gallons, and is located on the top of Prospect Hill, one hundred and forty feet above the first level.

By a liberal policy the company has allowed water-pipes to be laid through all the principal streets of the village, and gratuitously furnishes water for fire purposes to the town.

For more than a decade prior to 1866, little or nothing had been done to keep the mills in good repair beyond the absolutely necessary repairs to keep the machinery in motion.

From 1866 to 1869 an addition of one hundred and sixty-three feet by one hundred feet was made to the present No. 2, the two old mills consolidated, and the whole partially furnished with new machinery, turbines substituted for the old breast-wheels, at a cost of nearly seven hundred thousand dollars.

Upon the decease of Mr. Spooner, September, 1869, Charles W. Freeland became treasurer.

In 1871 was commenced the renovation of the lower level mills, under the immediate supervision of William A. Burke, of Lowell, who had previously been appointed assistant treasurer.

The three mills were consolidated and covered under one flat roof, and a complete suite of new machinery, including turbines where breast-wheels had been used, was put in, the whole, when complete, comparing favorably with the best mills in the country.

In 1872 a fine new stone dam was built in place of the old wooden dam on the upper level, and an addition of two feet to the height of the Milton Three Ponds dam.

A four hundred and fifty horse-power Corliss engine for reserve power was put into No. 1 during this year.

In 1874-75 the last of the old breast-wheels were taken out of No. 1, and a fifty-four-inch turbine and gearing substituted.

From 1870 to 1874 improvement in the works was the order of the day, and there was expended in the various constructions, reconstructions, and special repairs upwards of nine hundred thousand dollars.

In July, 1874, John Cumnock, the present agent, succeeded Mr. Burleigh, and in December, 1875, Charles H. Dalton became treasurer upon the resignation of Mr. Freeland.

At this time, owing to the large expenditures which had been made upon the works, the company was not only without an active capital, but the plant was impaired to the extent of a quarter of a million dollars.

But by a rigid economy at the mills, and a corresponding reduction in the cost of the manufactured goods, together with the tact, energy, and financial skill of the treasurer, the company at the close of his administration in December, 1877, was relieved of its debt on the plant, and had accumulated an active capital of forty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. Dalton having resigned to assume the management of the Merrimac Company, Daniel Hussey succeeded to the office, and resigned December, 1878, his term of office being remarkable only for its brevity.

Mr. Dalton subsequently managed the affairs of the company as its treasurer pro tempore until the election of the present treasurer, Rev. A. P. Rockwell.

The company now has three mills, containing 112,000 spindles and 2756 looms, operated by about 1800 hands. The mills consume upwards of 13,000 bales of cotton, and produce over 23,000,000 yards of cloth annually.

The company has one of the finest water privileges in the State, it having the unrestricted control of the Salmon Falls River to the third level at Great Falls, including the tributaries and reservoirs, consisting of the Great East, Horn's, and Wilson's Ponds on the East Branch, Cook's, Lovell's, and Cate's on the West Branch, and the Three Ponds at Milton, a flowage exceeding five thousand acres in all.

There is about four thousand horse-power on the three levels at Great Falls, of which only about two thousand five hundred horse-power is employed, from which it appears that the water-power is sufficient when improved to enlarge the present capacity of the works about fifty per cent.

With the present able general directory of the company's affairs, and the skillful practical management of the present resident agent at the mills, the future prosperity of the company is not a matter of doubt.

The present officers of the company are as follows: Charles H. Dalton, president; A. P. Rockwell, treasurer; John Cumnock, agent; and E. J. Randall, clerk of the corporation. Board of Directors, C. H. Dalton, T. J. Coolidge, S. R. Payson, G. R. Minot, C. W. Freeland, Thomas Wigglesworth, Edward Spaulding, and D. H. Buffam.

The Great Falls Woolen Company was organized in 1862 as a joint-stock company, with the following board of directors: William Hill, John H. Burleigh, George W. Burleigh, M. C. Burleigh, and Nathaniel Wells. It was chartered in June, 1863, and in the following December was organized as the Great Falls Woolen Company. Its paid-in capital was fifty thousand dollars, which was subsequently increased in July, 1865, to one hundred thousand dollars. The erection of the mills was commenced in 1862 and completed in 1863.

William Hill, of North Berwick, Me., was the first president of the corporation, and continued as such until 1874, when he was succeeded by John H. Burleigh. Mr. Burleigh remained until 1877, when he was succeeded by David H. Buffam. Mr. Buffam resigned in 1879, and Mr. John Cumnock, the present president, was chosen his successor.

David H. Buffam was agent, treasurer, and clerk until 1873, when he was forced to resign in consequence of ill health. Mr. Edward Hargraves was appointed his successor, and continued as agent and treasurer until 1880, when Mr. Buffam again officiated for one year, and in 1881 was succeeded as agent and clerk by his son, Mr. Edgar S. Buffam. The present officers are John Cumnock, president; David H. Buffam, treasurer; and Edgar S. Buffam, agent and clerk.

This company has from the beginning been under able management, and is one of the most prosperous in New England. The mills are furnished with all modern improvements, and the manufacture consists of cashmeres and duckings. The annual product reaches about two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

The Somersworth Machine Company was incorporated in the year 1848, with the following incorporators: Milton Noyes, Arthur L. Noyes, Frederick A. Lord, Oliver Hill, Micajah C. Burleigh, Abraham Gilpatrick, Richard Davis, William Bedel, and Samuel D. Whitehouse. Their first meeting was held Tuesday, July 15, 1851, at the counting-room of M. C. Burleigh, at which time John A. Burleigh, Oliver H. Lord, and M. C. Burleigh were chosen directors for the coming year. At a meeting of the directors held the same day, John A. Burleigh was chosen president; Micajah C. Burleigh and Oliver H. Lord, agents; M. C. Russell, clerk. About this time the Somersworth Machine Company bought out the Griffins' foundry at Salmon Falls, N. H., and commenced to manufacture the famous wood-stove known everywhere as the White Mountain stove. They had a very large sale on that stove, every one liking them. They still have some calls for the same stove. From that time on they have continued to manufacture stoves of all kinds at Salmon Falls, employing a large number of men there the year round. The foundry at Great Falls was devoted more particularly to heavy work, such as gas-pipe, water-pipe, etc. They took various large contracts for building gas-works. One was at Concord, another at Gardiner, Me., another at Attleboro', besides a great many other places which time nor space will not allow of mention. In 1858, O. H. Lord was chosen treasurer, and Micajah C. Burleigh, agent, which place he filled continuously until his death, in March, 1881. At the annual meeting of the directors in March, 1881, Oliver H. Lord was chosen treasurer, and C. W. Wright was chosen agent. At the present time they are making a great many pulleys for Boston market, besides a great deal of shafting, employing a large number of men at Great Falls the year round on that class of work. The business both at Salmon Falls and Great Falls has been gradually growing until at the present time they are employing one hundred and fifty men at both places, with a steady increase.

The Great Falls Gas Company is an enterprise that had its conception with the Great Falls Manufacturing Company, and has since been controlled by that corporation. It is said to have been the first gas company incorporated in the State. The act of incorporation was passed June 29, 1850, and the following were named as incorporators: Nathaniel Wells, Samuel Clark, John A. Burleigh, John Clark, Ichabod G. Jordan, Augustus Cushing, Daniel H. Buffam, George W. Beasbridge, Calvin Whitten, Mark Noble, Albert F. Smith, and Ezra Hartham.

The first board of directors were John A. Burleigh, John Clark, Nathaniel Wells, David H. Buffam, and Levi Bendict.

Nathaniel Wells was chosen first president, and John A. Burleigh, treasurer. It has a paid-up capital of forty-seven thousand dollars. The works were constructed by Benedict & Warren.

The present board of directors is as follows: A. P. Rockwell, William R. Burleigh, John Cunnock, and Emery J. Randall. The present officers are A. P. Rockwell, president; John Cunnock, treasurer; Emery J. Randall, clerk; and Thomas G. Jameson, superintendent.

Congregational Church.—Prior to the incorporation of the Great Falls Manufacturing Company in 1823 the site of the present village of Great Falls was used for farming purposes, and the few inhabitants of the neighborhood were numbered among the parishioners of Rev. Joseph Hilliard, in Berwick, Me., and Rev. Reuben Porter, of the old church in Somersworth. Soon after the settlement of the village commenced, however, religious meetings were holden, and Rev. Mr. Porter stately preached in an unfinished dwelling-house on Bridge Street, Berwick, belonging to the manufacturing company.

Meanwhile measures were being taken for the organization of a church, and on the 16th day of January, 1827, "The Piscataqua Association of Ministers" met in the village, approved of the proposed creed and covenant, and organized the "First Congregational Church of Great Falls," consisting of eight members.

Rev. Reuben Porter was invited to preach as "stated supply," in which capacity he labored during the year 1827. He died January, 1854.

A meeting was held Sept. 13, 1827, in the village school-house by citizens favorable to the purpose, and "The First Congregational Society of Great Falls" was organized under the then new law of the State relating to religious societies.

On the 23d of January, 1828, Rev. Josiah T. Hawes was ordained pastor of the church. His pastorate lasted but two years.

Arrangements were made during the latter part of 1827 for the erection of a suitable house of public worship. The manufacturing company generously contributed an appropriate lot and five hundred dollars, and in the following year the church edifice was completed at a further expense of about four thousand dollars. It was dedicated in August, 1828, Dr. Lyman Beecher preaching the sermon. This society was aided for several years in the support of its pastor by the Piscataqua Association, the New Hampshire Missionary Society, and the Massachusetts Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge.

The ordination services of Mr. William Twining as an evangelist were held in the church Jan. 6, 1830. He never was pastor of the church, but remained as a "supply" for two years and three months. During his ministry one hundred and four united with the church, as the result of a revival begun under Mr. Hawes' pastorate, and continued under the labors of Mr. Twining.

Rev. James A. Smith, next pastor, remained five years and three months. He was ordained April 17, 1832. Under his care the church greatly flourished. One hundred and twenty-five additions were made during his pastorate. The feeble health of his wife compelled his resignation July, 1837.

Mr. Smith's successor was Rev. Alfred Goldsmith, whose pastorate covered only eleven months. He was ordained pastor September, 1837.

The Rev. John R. Adams began his labors with the church as acting pastor September, 1838. He remained two years and four months. Under his labors seventy-one united with the church. His death occurred April, 1866.

The next pastor, Rev. Samuel Beane, was ordained July 7, 1841; dismissed May, 1844. He died May, 1865.

The seventh pastor was Rev. James T. McCollom, installed October, 1844; dismissed December, 1853. Seventy-six were received into the church during his pastorate. He died November, 1865.

Rev. James B. Thornton was acting pastor of the church eleven months, beginning his labors April 11, 1854. During that time thirty-four were received into the church.

Rev. George Anthony, next pastor, was ordained Oct. 3, 1855. His pastorate was four years and eleven months, during which time ninety-three were added to the church.

Rev. Horatio Q. Butterfield was installed pastor May 23, 1861. During his pastorate of three years and eleven months eighty-nine united with the church.

Rev. Ephraim N. Hidden was the eleventh pastor, installed Jan. 5, 1865; dismissed Dec. 30, 1869. He is living at present in East Medway, Mass. He was followed by Rev. Clark Carter, who was installed April 27, 1870. His pastorate closed in June, 1872.

The Rev. Stephen W. Webb was called to the office of pastor in January, 1873, installed October 15th of the same year, and dismissed in 1881. During the winter of 1875-76 there was a revival, from the fruits of which over sixty were received into the church.

It was voted in the spring of 1876 to remodel the church edifice. The work was begun in July, and occupied over six months. The committee having the work in charge were Messrs. S. S. Rollins, D. H. Bufam, J. Cummock, A. A. Perkins, and William F. Lord. The church by these repairs became possessed of a pleasant, commodious vestry in which to hold its social and week-day meetings, together with the other rooms and conveniences of a modern church. At this time, also, over three-fourths of the pews of the church were given up by their owners to become the property of the society.

Deacons, John Crosby, January, 1827, to February, 1831; David Sellick, January, 1827, to July, 1831; Thomas Shapleigh, August, 1830, to January, 1835; Josiah Beane, February, 1835, to August, 1841; Jeremy W. Orange, February, 1835, to June, 1879; Joseph Stackpole, June, 1850, to March, 1854; Benjamin Cook, June, 1850, to August, 1862; George L. Dearborn, July, 1858, to March, 1859; Samuel S. Rollins (died in 1881), July, 1858; William Symes, May, 1859; Oliver D. Morse, February, 1864, to June, 1865; Almon D. Tolles, February, 1879.

A Sunday-school was organized with three scholars soon after the formation of the church by Mr. James S. Stanwood in a room over his store. Mr. Stanwood was superintendent until his death in 1839.

The First Congregational Society was organized Sept. 13, 1827, with Joshua Edmunds as the first moderator and Jonathan W. Freeman, clerk. The constitution was adopted Oct. 24, 1827. The first members were Benjamin Barker, John McCullis, and Raymond Mather.

The High Street Methodist Episcopal Society was organized Sept. 22, 1827, with the following members: Alfred French, Charles Lewis, Moses Butes, David Miner, Simon Hall, Bartlett Hall, Christopher C. Wolcott, John G. Chase, Thomas T. Egerly, John Horn, and George W. Ederly.

The first Methodist sermon preached in what is now Great Falls was at the house of Gershom Horne in 1817, by Rev. John Lord, then laboring on the Rochester Circuit, which embraced Dover, Somersworth, Berwick, and several other towns. Gershom Horne and family were at this time the chief proprietors of the village. In 1825, Rev. J. N. Moffitt, pastor at Dover, held occasional services here in an unfinished house on Bridge Street. The first class was organized in 1826, and consisted of eight persons. The first pastor was Rev. Giles Campbell. He was succeeded by Rev. Aaron D. Sargent. In the beginning of Mr. Sargent's ministry services were first held in an unfinished room in one of the mills, but soon after measures were taken for the erection of a house of worship, and in September, 1828, a neat and commodious edifice was dedicated, Rev. Stephen Martindale, of Boston, preaching the sermon.

During the year 1827 a legal organization was effected, known as the "Great Falls Methodist Society."

The following is a list of the pastors from the organization of the church to the present time: Revs. Giles Campbell, Aaron D. Sargent, Benjamin R. Hoyt, George Storrs, John F. Adams, George Storrs, Daniel S. Robinson (assistant), Samuel Morris, Jos. Dearborn (assistant), Eleazer Smith, Elihu Scott, James W. Mowry, Daniel S. Robinson, Silas Green, Henry W. Main Street Methodist Episcopal Church.—The crowded condition of the Methodist Church in High Street in 1850 suggested the need of a second church, and accordingly a number of Methodists, to whom were joined a few individuals from other denominations, petitioned the New Hampshire Conference for a minister to be sent them. The petition was granted, and Henry Hill was sent as preacher, and he held the first meeting at the town hall, April 18, 1851, and the Second Methodist Church was soon after organized. He preached there two years, and was succeeded by Calvin Holman, who gathered the funds by which the church building was built in 1855. The organization was at first prosperous, but, on account of a change in population from native to foreign, the congregation has decreased to about two hundred.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

HON. DANIEL G. ROLLINS.

This history would not be complete without at least brief mention of the lineage and life of Hon. Daniel G. Rollins. Of his ancestry, we have the names of nearly a hundred who sleep within or near the limits of Rockingham and Stafford Counties. Of these, Nicholas Frost, ancestor, it is believed, of all who in this county bear his surname, was one of the three who established the line between Maine and New Hampshire.

Rev. John Wheelwright and Elder William Wentworth were of the Exeter Confederation of 1639. Hon. John Plaisted was Speaker of the New Hampshire Assembly in 1696, and judge of the Superior Court for twenty years. Hon. John Pickering was Speaker of the same body in 1677. Maj. Richard Wadron, of the Indian wars, was long time commandant of the provincial forces, and Hon. Ichabod Rollins was judge of probate for the county of Stratford at the organization of the State, in 1776.

The subject of this sketch was born in Lebanon, Me., Oct. 3, 1796, but it was in this State that he spent most of his long and useful life, and proved himself worthy of his honorable ancestry. While yet a child he made frequent and extended visits to the home of his paternal grandfather, now that of Mr. Frank Hale, on the banks of the Salmon Falls River, in Rollinsford, and neither that town nor any of the towns about it has perhaps ever had an inhabitant more familiar than he with every road and by-way, and nook and corner, important fact and interesting tradition in its local history.

Mr. Rollins was the son of John Rollins and Betsey Shapleigh, both of unmixed English descent, and the ancestors of both had lived in America for almost two centuries. James Rollins settled in what is now Newington in 1634, and Alexander Shapleigh, as agent of Sir Ferdinando Gorges, went to Elliot, Me., about 1630. Both these men were from Devonshire, England. They established their homes almost directly opposite each other, on the shores of the beautiful Piscataqua, and the farms which that river watered have never been alienated except by death, but have remained in their possession and the possession of their respective descendants for almost two hundred and fifty years, and unto this day. Mr. Rollins was the third of eleven children,—nine sons and two daughters. All of them were born in Lebanon; all of them, save one, an infant, survived their parents; and when their mother died at their old homestead all the living except one were at her burial, and there had not been a death in their family for half a century. Of such sturdy stock came Judge Rollins.

His boyhood was largely spent upon his father's farm, admirably located in a community intelligent and religious. It was there that his character and health, for which inheritance had done so much, was fashioned and strengthened, so that at early manhood, when he went out into the great world for himself, he carried with him the elements and assurance of a successful life.

The year 1822 he spent in Boston, and he often afterwards loved to fancy the story of his life as it would have read had he remained there. From 1823 to 1826 he was agent of a sugar refining company in Portsmouth, and while there, until his marriage, in 1825, he was a fellow-boarder in a private family with the Hons, Ichabod Bartlett, W. H. Y. Hackett, and Ichabod Goodwin, all then young, unmarried men, and the friendships which then began lasted through the lives of all. From 1826 to 1835 he resided in Wakefield, and from the last date until his death in Great Falls. Until 1848 he was engaged in mercantile and manufacturing pursuits, sometimes extensively, always successfully. Afterwards he was for four years president of the Great Falls and South Berwick Railroad. Of the Great Falls and Conway Railroad he was treasurer five years and president two years. He was a director in the Great Falls Bank sixteen years, and from the time of its organization until his death was vice-president of the Somersworth Savings-Bank. His fellow-citizens gave frequent expressions of their estimate of him. Five times in Wakefield they chose him one of the selectmen of that town. Of Somersworth he was selectman seven years, town treasurer eight years, and three years he was one of its representatives in the State Legislature. From 1857 to 1866, when he reached the age of seventy, and was thereby incapacitated by the State constitution from longer service, he was judge of probate for the county of Strafford.

Judge Rollins was fortunate in his marriage. It was during his residence in Portsmouth that he first met Miss Susan Binney Jackson, who was there as a pupil at a boarding-school. Connected with their early acquaintance is a pleasant little romance, which our limited space will not allow us to give. Sufficient to say that it ended, if it has yet ended, in a marriage altogether harmonious and ideal. Miss Jackson was of Watertown, Mass., of a family prominently associated with the early settlement of that State, and of military distinction during the Revolutionary war, and she brought to her new home health, hope, culture, good cheer, and a large circle of delightful friends.

They were married on the 31 of February, 1825, by Rev. Dr. Borie, of Watertown, Rev. Dr. Francis, afterwards for many years chaplain of Harvard College, giving her in marriage, and Mr. David Lee Childs, afterwards the husband of Lydia Maria, Dr. Francis' sister, serving as best man; and they celebrated their golden wedding on the 31 of February, 1875, only twenty days before his death. What domestic joys and sorrows, hopes and fears for themselves and their family were crowded into their fifty years of wedded life! During all that time, however employed and whatever his sources of pleasure, it was in his home that he found his rest, refreshment, inspiration, and largest delight. To that he gave his best thought and his whole heart. Of his eleven children, two died in early life and nine survived him, and are still living. His sons are Franklin J., of Portland, for many years United States collector of internal revenue in the District of Maine; Edward A., Speaker of the New

New Hampshire House of Representatives in 1861 and 1862, afterwards and for a long time United States Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and now president of the Centennial National Bank of Philadelphia; Daniel G., for some time District Attorney for the city and county of New York, and now Surrogate there; and George F., of the Treasury Department, in Washington. His daughters are Mrs. Thomas C. Parks, of Newton, Mass.; Mrs. Oliver W. Shaw, of Austin, Minn.; and Mrs. John P. Pope, Miss Carrie E., and Miss Mary P., who, with their beloved mother, still enriching their lives and the lives of all the rest, keep the generous, hospitable doors of the old homestead in Great Falls wide open, as they have been kept for more than a generation.

Mr. Rollins' opportunities in early life for education at school were limited, as were those of most boys of his time and locality, but his mind was disciplined by its constant judicious exercise, and filled by his natural aptitude for the selection of the best things to read and study and by absorption from all his surroundings. He was well informed, and along with his love for the useful and the practical he had a marked poetic taste, and several early productions of his own pen are rhythmical and tender, and abound with sentiment. He gave his children the advantages of the best high schools and academies of their times, and two of his sons were graduated at Dartmouth College. He was a man of unusual enterprise. Before living in Great Falls, and when the village was small, he erected half a dozen of its largest buildings. His steam-mill, on the Berwick side of the Salmon Falls, was the first in all this section of the country. He was largely instrumental in the projection, construction, and management of the Great Falls and Conway and the Great Falls and South Berwick Railroads. He was an incorporator of the Great Falls bank and of the Somersworth Savings-Bank, and had much to do with the action of the town in the selection and purchase of what is now Forest Glade Cemetery, to which he gave its name.

His enterprises were successful because of his industry and energy, and especially because these were guided and controlled by sound judgment. His heart was warm and his sympathies quick, but his judgment was logical, and where the rights of others were involved, superior alike to friendships and enmities.

These qualities especially fitted him for the performance of the duties which devolved upon him as Judge of Probate, and won for him, while he occupied that office, the high respect of the bar and the approbation of the public. The unfortunate and disappointed made him their confidant, and it is the privilege of few to render to such more service. He had the rare power of discerning the moral quality and the motives of men, of weighing well their worth or worthlessness, and in its exercise he rarely made mistakes. His integrity was never challenged nor suspected; he was a man of rare personal purity; his speech was never unclean, profane, or irreverent; he was subject to no evil habit; his whole moral nature was elevated. Reared in a Christian home, he was always attracted and controlled by religious truth. In the town where he lived he was always a constant attendant upon the Congregational Church, but it was not until 1857 that he publicly professed his faith in Christ and became a member of that church. He was always interested in its welfare, and almost his last work was with reference to the alteration of the church edifice and the enlargement of its vestry. The improvements which were made after his death were in harmony with the plans which he prepared in his life. He never grew old, for his heart at seventy-eight was as young as at forty, and to the last he was the companion of his children and grandchildren, no less than their counselor and guide. Only two or three days before his death he assisted them in the preparation of charades for private exhibition. Yet all the while he was ripening naturally and gradually for another and a better world. Taking large interest in existing things and current events in his neighborhood and State and country, he had a yet larger interest in the universal and the immortal. His hold upon the material and the apparent grew measurably less and still less, and the glories of that country of which the Scriptures make prophecy and full promise grew brighter and yet brighter, until on the morning of the 22d of February, 1875, as quietly and restfully as a ripened leaf falls in the autumn, he gave up the ghost and died in a good old age,—an old man full of years,—and was gathered to his people, and his sons buried him in the place which he had prepared for himself, and the whole community mourned for him as for one of its best and most beloved citizens.

MICAJAH CURRIER BURLEIGH.

Micajah Currier Burleigh was born in South Berwick, Me., Jan. 15, 1818.

His father, William Burleigh, was one of the leading lawyers of York County, and at the time of his death, at the age of forty-two, was serving his third term as representative in the National Congress from the First Maine District. He had come from his father's farm in Gilmanton, N. H., to South Berwick, and won for himself an extensive practice in his profession and a prominent position in the affairs of his adopted State. He left a widow, Deborah (Currier) Burleigh, and five small children, of whom the eldest, Micajah, was barely nine. The others were John Holmes, a sea-captain for several years, and afterwards a successful woollen manufacturer in South Berwick. He was also for two terms representative for this district in Congress. William, the only surviving member of the family, now a farmer in Iowa, Mary Currier, and Elizabeth, both of whom died unmarried.

Mrs. Burleigh, a woman of rare good sense and ability, finding herself left with a small property and a young and helpless family, immediately cast about for means to increase her income. But so little could she make during the next three years that she was often obliged to part with articles of household furniture, endeared by association, to find the wherewithal to feed and clothe her little ones. The poverty and struggles of his mother were so distressing to the young Micajah, that he finally obtained her reluctant consent that he might go to sea, believing that his earnings might keep her in her need. From that time on, with the exception of one or two terms each in Stratford (N. H.) Academy and New London (N. H.) Academy, and a few months spent in studying law with his uncle, Hon. John A. Burleigh, he followed the sea for fourteen years. During these years he rose from the lowest position on board a vessel to the highest, that of master, and had the satisfaction of knowing that his labor on the sea served to materially lighten the heavy burden resting upon his mother's shoulders at home.

Finally he yielded to her urgent entreaties, his brothers and sisters being now grown and beyond the reach of pressing necessity, and left the sea. He went into trade with the firm of Parks & Hains, of South Berwick, first as clerk and later as partner. But retail trade not being the business of which he desired to make a life-work, he soon left this and bought an interest with W. & E. Griffin, iron founders, then running two small foundries, one at Salmon Falls, the other at Great Falls. This connection was not a fortunate one. The result was that in the course of two or three years Mr. Burleigh had to assume the entire business of both foundries.

On the day he was thirty years old he started in business for himself with the wreck of the entire property acquired by his partners, some cash in hand, and nearly three thousand dollars more of debts than he had the wherewithal to pay.

Industry and skill put matters in good working order. The debts were paid, and an act of incorporation, under the name of the Somersworth Machine Company, was procured from the New Hampshire Legislature in 1849. Soon after this he interested with himself Mr. Oliver H. Lord, an old neighbor in South Berwick, who had moved to Great Falls some years before, and having been successful in business, had retired with what he then considered a competency. Mr. Lord's money was needed to enlarge the capacity of the enterprise, which was then in its infancy. After a careful examination nearly all of it was forthcoming, and a close personal intimacy was then formed between the two men, which continued without a jar for more than thirty years, and was severed only by death. The Somersworth Machine Company was a success from the start, and is still in full and profitable operation on a scale many times larger than in the beginning. Mr. Burleigh was agent, and Mr. Lord treasurer of the corporation, and together they owned nearly all of its stock. Until 1864 they were jointly interested in the active management of its affairs, but in that year the Dover Iron Foundry was purchased, and Mr. Lord took charge of it, and from that time on the original business was under control of Mr. Burleigh alone as its executive head.

To this business he devoted the best years of his life; with it his name was inseparably connected, and from its profits he acquired most of the property which he accumulated.

Once permanently located in Somersworth, and established in business there, the public affairs of the town and State shared his attention with his private interests. He was always a man of great public spirit, and as soon as the condition of his own affairs would permit, he devoted much time to the performance of those duties which the welfare of the nation demands of her best citizens.

He was early honored by the confidence of his fellow-citizens. In 1854 he was elected one of the representatives from the town of Somersworth to the New Hampshire Legislature, and was re-elected in 1855. In 1858 and again in 1859 he was a State senator. He was also a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1876.

While in conversation he was clear in his mode of expression and apt in his illustrations, he was not in public either a fluent or a ready speaker. He was, therefore, never prominent in the debates of any legislative body of which he was a member, but in the important work of the committees his industry, good judgment, and strong common sense gave him an influence upon the general body of legislation not possessed by many men of more prominence in the reports of proceedings. In 1861-62 he was a member of the staff of Governor Joseph A. Gilmore. In 1855 he was elected a director of the Great Falls Bank, and held this office until the bank was reorganized under the National Bank Act in 1866, when he received the same position in the Great Falls National Bank, and continued to act until his death. In 1861 the office of president of the Somersworth Savings-Bank became vacant upon the death of John A. Burleigh. To this position he was also elected and re-elected until his death, being then in his twentieth year of consecutive service. To this institution, next to the care of his family and the management of his business, were his best thoughts devoted. Indeed, there were several times in its affairs when he gave to it more than to both the others. Its prosperity was his pride, and any touch of adversity certainly was more keenly felt than a like loss to his own private property. It is known that a loss in his own business would be dismissed with little more than a passing remark, while a loss to the savings-bank of perhaps a less proportionate amount, occurring at about the same time, would cause more than one night of unrest.

On Dec. 9, 1847, he married Mary Frances Russell, of Somersworth, and of their ten children but four survive him.

William Russell, born Feb. 13, 1851, a graduate of Dartmouth College, and now a practicing lawyer in Great Falls, N. H.

Mary Elizabeth, wife of Charles W. Wright, of Great Falls, who, since the death of Mr. Burleigh, has succeeded in the management of the Somersworth Machine Company.

Edward Stark, graduated at Dartmouth College in 1878, and now a resident of Florida.

Charlotte Russell, the youngest of the family, and residing with her mother in Great Falls.

While a student at New London Academy, he united with the Calvinist Baptist Church, and of the denomination he remained until his death a devoted and consistent member.

In personal appearance Mr. Burleigh was a man above medium height, broad-shouldered and deep-chested, weighing when in health considerably over two hundred pounds, always erect, and usually agile in his carriage. A large massive head, features strong and regular, a clear blue eye, and a mass of dark, wavy hair, turned in his later years to silvery white, made him a marked man in all places of assemblage. His manner of address was direct, at times abrupt, but not intentionally blunt, and never malicious. He was always too kind and tender-hearted to pain even a personal enemy, and when aware that he had thoughtlessly wounded another's feelings, he always suffered as much pain as he inflicted.

In his business relations he won the respect of all with whom he came in contact. The manners of the quarter-deck never entirely forsook him, and retaining a sailor's directness of speech, he retained a directness of method as well.

It was his nature to be straightforward and upright in all his business affairs, to gain success by an honest preponderance of mental force and foresight, not by artifice or petty cunning, and the same treatment he extended he always expected in return. Incapable of deceit himself, he was intolerant of it in another, and nothing excited a deeper or more lasting anger than to find that some one had been attempting to practice it upon him. For a trickster, however successful, he had no use, and next to a trickster a slanderer was the object of his cordial dislike. The sterling honesty of his dealings gave him the confidence of his business associates, and those who had known him longest were at his death his sincerest mourners.

It was as an active and successful business man that he was best and most widely known. He was for more than thirty years the head of an extensive manufacturing establishment. This gave him prominence and influence at home and a wide and varied circle of acquaintance. His success was due to diligence, foresight, and judgment, rather than to thrift or frugality, to the acquiring rather than the retaining faculties and habits. He was always prudent and economical, but never close or niggardly; he thus retained the personal friendship of all. His employés felt that he was their friend, that they were sure of receiving at his hand fair treatment and liberal pay for their labor, that their interests, as well as his own, were considered by him, and they served him well and faithfully. The long years of their dealings together were uniformly pleasant, strikes were unknown, and mutual confidence prevailed. His customers soon learned that he meant fairly by them too, that he had no desires to overreach or drive sharp bargains, and having dealt with him once they came again, and thus it happened that he retained at once their friendship and their trade. In his private affairs he was open-handed, generous, and liberally benevolent. His income for many years was quite large, and had he been content to live in a frugal manner he might easily have attained considerable wealth, but his expenditures always kept pace with the increase of his receipts. His own tastes were always plain and simple, and he had not one expensive habit; whatever increase there was benefited others, not himself. His family was large, and was generously provided for. His hospitality was bounded only by the limits of his dwelling. It was seldom that his table was bare of guests. His church was always sure of his bountiful liberality, nor did he restrict himself to his own, to at least two others in the town he contributed regularly and freely. The poor he had always with him; the extent of his liberality in this direction was never known except to himself, but it is certain that no poor man ever turned away from him empty-handed. His generosity was never made public by him. It is not within the recollection of his family that a single instance of it was ever learned from himself, always from the recipients of his bounty, nor was it confined to the years of his prosperity, though it was greater then. During his first winter in business, when he was harassed and in debt, he literally gave the coat from his back to a workman to enable him to attend church, and wore himself his working clothes, for he could not afford to buy others. His generosity simply grew with his ability to indulge it.

In his family his whole life was bound up. For them he lived, worked, and planned. For his own comfort he seldom took a thought, for theirs he was ever devising something. Not favored with a liberal education himself, he determined that his children should be afforded every advantage; but they were to be educated, not paupered, the advantages must be improved or they could not be enjoyed. While anxious for them to acquire knowledge, he was also careful that they should acquire habits of self-reliance and the ability to act and judge for themselves. In all their personal affairs he carefully watched over them, but always without interference, and, unless they were going entirely astray, he preferred they should learn their mistakes by experience. He seldom proffered his advice unasked. It then usually came in the form of a command, but when called upon an unlimited amount of time seemed always at his children's disposal.

The disadvantages of his early years were amply made up in after-life. His education bore the stamp of no college or university, but the metal was true. Not that he became a learned or profound scholar, but while devoting all needful time to the care of his business, he yet found leisure to acquaint himself well with all that goes to make up a well-informed man. The acquisition of knowledge was the most enjoyable of pleasures. No book was worth reading from which something could not be learned. No man was worth knowing who had not something to impart. He was all his life a student of books, of men, of science, of nature, and yet his fund of information always seemed well-nigh exhaustless. The extent and variety of his attainments was ever a source of wonder to his chance acquaintances. Was it a clergyman or college president at the seaside, a farmer, a mechanic, an engineer, or the physician at his bedside, he was at home with them all. The conversation seldom drifted into fields with whose paths he was not familiar.

The cause of education found him always a true and liberal friend. Intensely practical himself, he always fully appreciated the value to young men of an extensive and liberal course of study as a means to the end of making them useful and worthy citizens, and enabling them to exercise their talents for their own and their fellows' greatest good. He was for many years a trustee of South Berwick and New London Academies, and both were at different time the objects of his liberality. Among the last acts of his life was to direct the payment of a promised money prize to the latter institution. The society of educated men was especially enjoyable to him, and in literary exercises he was always interested. The graduation days of these academies were always attended by him when business engagements made it possible, and were among the bright days of the year.

In 1872, Dartmouth College, of which both his sons were graduates, conferred on him the honorary degree of Master of Arts, and of all the honors bestowed upon him during his life this is believed to have given him most gratification. The parchment certificate was carefully lodged in his safe with his most valuable papers. Of this institution he was also a liberal benefactor. He gave it two thousand dollars during his life, and by his will bequeathed it five thousand dollars more.

For more than a year before his death he was troubled with difficulty in breathing after rapid exercise. In the fall of 1880 he went to the Adirondacks with his second son, Edward, who had suffered from hemorrhages from the lungs. While there his trouble increased to such an extent that early in December he was compelled to return home. His physician early pronounced his case an advanced stage of Bright's disease, and hopeless. He was confined to the house from the first, and after a few weeks to his room. He suffered distressingly at times, but his mental faculties remained clear to the last. He was fully conscious of his condition, almost from the first, wrote his will with his own hand, arranged his business with the utmost calmness, counseled his children, and met death as only one can who knows he has employed his talents well.

The end came March 7, 1881.

OLIVER HUBBARD LORD.

Oliver Hubbard Lord, son of Ephraim and Sally Goodwin Lord, was born in Berwick (now South Berwick), Me., Nov. 19, 1811. His early boyhood was passed on the old homestead, and at the early age of eleven years he commenced an apprenticeship at the saddlery business in his native town. In 1827 he removed to Salmon Falls, and Oliver, then fifteen years of age, began work in the woolen-factory at that place. Pleasing in manners and prompt and efficient in the discharge of his duties, he attracted the attention of the agent, the late Joshua W. Peirce, of Greenland, who formed a warm friendship for young Lord, which lasted through life. Naturally ambitious, and perhaps being favored somewhat by the agent, he was rapidly promoted, and assigned to duties which proved to be too great a strain for his physical powers, and after an unremitting service of four years, in consequence of impaired health, he was compelled to leave the factory. He subsequently attended South Berwick Academy, and later we find him teaching school at Lebanon, Me.

May 28, 1832, he came to Great Falls, and his record from that time to the present is almost a history of the town.

He began his career here as clerk in the dry-goods store of George W. Lawton, where he remained one year, receiving fifty dollars for his services. The following year he engaged with the firm of Torr & Bates, at the rate of one hundred dollars per year, remaining but a short time, however, and then accepted the position of manager in the store of Jacob Davis, and two years later, upon furnishing twelve hundred dollars, became an equal partner with him in the business, the firm being known as Jacob Davis & Co. In 1836 he withdrew from this firm, and formed a copartnership with John B. Wood, under the firm-name of Wood & Lord, which continued until 1839. This partnership then dissolved, and Mr. Lord commenced trade alone, and continued in it with marked success until 1859, when he practically retired from the mercantile business.

Although having retired from mercantile business, he was by no means inactive. He passed a portion of the following year in the office of the Conway Railroad, and in June, 1851, in company with Hon. M. C. Burleigh, established the Somersworth Machine Company, and took one-half of the stock. He was one of its first agents, and soon after its organization was made its treasurer, and has remained as such to the present time.

Mr. Lord was one of the incorporators of the Somersworth Savings-Bank, and is the only surviving member of that body. He was also a trustee from its organization to 1876, when he declined a re-election. He was also one of the incorporators of the Great Falls Bank in 1846, and was a member of the first board of directors, and continued as such until 1852, when he resigned and accepted a directorship in the Salmon Falls Bank, then just organized. Although Mr. Lord has rendered valuable aid to the above-mentioned banking institutions, he has been more closely identified with the Somersworth Bank, in which he has ever manifested a deep interest. That the welfare of this bank has ever been close to his heart is evidenced by the fact that he has presided at its councils as president since its incorporation, in 1855, to Jan. 1, 1882,—nearly thirty years,—when he refused a re-election on account of impaired health.

Mr. Lord has owned stock in the various manufacturing establishments of Great Falls, and every movement looking to the religious, educational, or material welfare of the town has found in him an able advocate. He has been a member of the Forest Glade Cemetery Association twenty-five years, and been its president ten years. He is a member of the First Baptist Church, and has been a deacon since 1861.

Politically, Mr. Lord is a Republican, was formerly a Free Soiler, member of the Liberty party, and Whig. Although not what might be called an active politician, he has rendered yeoman service to the party in this town, and has been potent in its councils. He represented the town in the Legislature in 1861 and 1862.

Among the many public enterprises that Mr. Lord has given his aid to may be mentioned the Conway Railroad. In 1856 this road became embarrassed, generally believed irretrievably so. It was heavily mortgaged, its liabilities amounting to seventy-five thousand dollars, with no assets. The outlook was not a brilliant one for the stockholders. It required an assessment of sixty per cent. to carry it along, and Mr. Lord, at this gloomy period, undertook the herculean task of raising the assessment. It was a hard and protracted struggle, but his efforts were finally crowned with success. He placed the road on a sound basis and subsequently became its nominal president. He was chairman of the board of trustees of the third bondholders, who took possession of the road.

In August, 1838, Mr. Lord united in marriage with Mary W. G. Stevens, daughter of Dr. Whiting Stevens, of Shapleigh, Me., and their family consisted of seven children, four of whom survive, two sons and two daughters, viz.: George Boardman, who married Lizzie C. Mott, and resides in Somersworth; Mary A., wife of James P. Dixon, president of Colby Academy, New London, N. H.; Annie A., wife of Charles E. Marston, proprietor of the Dover Iron Foundry and Machine-Works; and Edward Oliver, who married Mary B. Horne, and resides at Great Falls. He graduated at Colby University in 1877, and in 1880 received the degree of Master of Arts. He is editor and proprietor of the Free Press and Journal, one of the leading local journals of the State.

Oliver H. Lord's acquaintance with public men of Maine, New Hampshire, and Massachusetts is very extensive, and he is held in high esteem by a large circle of friends.

DAVID H. BUFFUM.

David Hanson Buffum, son of Timothy and Anna Austin Buffum, was born in North Berwick, Me., Nov. 10, 1820. His father died when he was but six years of age, and in consequence of the slender resources of the widowed mother, young David was taken into the family of his father's brother, with whom he remained until seventeen years of age. During this time he attended several terms at an academy, and later we find him engaged in the laudable vocation of teaching school.

In 1839 he came to Great Falls and entered a store as clerk, receiving eight dollars per month as compensation. At the age of twenty-one he purchased an interest of one of his employers and continued two years, when he disposed of his interest in that firm and erected a brick block containing three stores, one of which he occupied in general merchandising, and continued in the mercantile business with marked success until Dec. 5, 1846, when he was chosen cashier of the newly-organized Great Falls Bank, and officiated in that capacity until April 20, 1863. While cashier of the Great Falls Bank he was elected treasurer, in August, 1857, of the Somersworth Savings-Bank, and continued as such ten years. In 1857, Mr. Buffum, in company with the late Hon. John H. Burleigh, organized the Newichawanick Woolen Company, at South Berwick, Me., and in 1862 he organized the Great Falls Woolen Company, with a capital of fifty thousand dollars. This company was at once successful, and the capital was soon increased to one hundred thousand dollars. Mr. Buffum has been treasurer and general manager of this corporation since its organization, except for a few years, when, in consequence of impaired health, he was compelled to retire from active business. Mr. Buffum, for nearly a quarter of a century, has been engaged in the manufacture of woolen fabrics, and with that success which attends energy and first-class business management. He is also the owner of a felt-mill at Milton, N. H., a partner in the wool-pulling establishment of L. R. Hersom & Co., of Berwick,

Me., and treasurer and director of the Newichawanick Woolen Company, at South Berwick, and has also been a director in the Great Falls Manufacturing Company since 1877. He has been prominently identified with the banking interest of the town, and has been prominent in the councils of the Great Falls Bank and the Somersworth Savings-Bank since their incorporation. He is now vice-president of the latter and president of the former.

Public-spirited and of a progressive mind, Mr. Buffum has ever been foremost in all movements which, in his judgment, tended to the advancement of the welfare of his adopted town. He was town clerk in 1843-44, moderator in 1848-57, and selectman in 1846-71-72. His fellow-citizens have recognized his ability and worth, and have chosen him to various positions of responsibility and trust. He represented the town in the Legislature in 1861-62, serving the first year on the Committee on Banks, and the second year as chairman of the Committee on the Reform School. He was elected to the Senate in 1877, and served on the Committees on the Judiciary, Finance, Banks, and State Institutions. In the following year, 1878, he was re-elected to the Senate, and was chosen its presiding officer. Mr. Buffum was the first president of the Senate from Strafford County as now constituted. In 1880 he was a delegate to the Republican National Convention at Chicago.

In all the positions which he has been called upon to occupy it may truly be said that he has discharged his duties with a conscientious regard for the public good.

Jan. 26, 1853, Mr. Buffum united in marriage with Charlotte E. Stickney, daughter of Alexander H. Stickney, of Great Falls, and their family consisted of four children, three sons and a daughter, viz.: Charlotte A. (died May 23, 1877), Edgar S., Harry A., and David H. Edgar S. is the agent of the Great Falls Woolen Company; Harry A. is manager of the felt-mills at Milton, N. H.; and David H. is an undergraduate at Yale.

Mr. Buffum attends the Congregational Church, to which he has ever been a liberal contributor.

CAPT. ISAAC CHANDLER.

Capt. Isaac Chandler was born in Windsor, Conn., Sept. 22, 1811. He remained in his native town until the age of sixteen years, when he procured employment in a factory at Ludlow, Mass., to cover rollers and as a mule-piecer. He remained there three years. In 1830 he came to Great Falls, N. H., and engaged in covering rollers for the Great Falls Manufacturing Company at twenty-two cents per day, and at the end of the year had saved from this pittance forty-nine dollars and seventy-six cents. He then commenced working in a mule-room for a slightly increased compensation. Hand-mule spinning required skilled labor, and as the manufacture of cotton was comparatively in its infancy in this country, all the spinners were brought from England, who monopolized the trade. Their time was about equally divided between spinning and beer-drinking, and but a small product was obtained for their labor. Mr. Chandler's perseverance and natural ingenuity soon made him master of the machine and he commenced spinning, working for his own and his employer's interest. He soon showed them the increased product of a mule run by a young and energetic American. Everything was done to diminish his product, and his mules were frequently disordered during his absence, but he had no affiliation with their combination or their habits. Soon other young men were apprenticed to the business, and in a short time no foreigners were employed as spinners. In 1835 he took charge of the belt- and roller-shop for the corporation, which position he still retains.

The systematic and rigid economy which enabled young Chandler to save so large percentage of his first earnings was characteristic of his whole life, which with good judgment in making his first investment laid the foundation for his great financial success. When twenty-two years of age, before there were any railroads leading to the West, and long before Horace Greeley emphasized the words "Go West, young man," he discerned that the star of empire was tending towards the setting sun, and soon the track of the buffalo and the trail of the red man would be buried by the plowshare, and the outposts of civilization would be constantly moving towards the Pacific slope, which would enhance the values of the then almost worthless lands. He collected his available funds, concealed them in a leathern girdle, and by stage-coach and canal-boat, on foot and on horseback, went to what was then the far West, and invested his funds in wild lands, and the subsequent returns from this investment attest the correctness of his youthful foresight and good judgment.

Mr. Chandler has held many places of honor and trust in the town; has been identified with all its leading interests. He held a captain's commission for four years in the New Hampshire State militia, is a director of the Great Falls National Bank, vice-president of the Somersworth Savings-Bank, has been a director of the Great Falls and Conway Railroad, was one of the founders of the Manufacturers' and village library, represented the town in the Legislature of 1854, and has been a member of the school committee for a period of thirty years. When first elected a member of the school committee there were no graded schools in this vicinity. He visited schools in Boston, Lowell, and other cities in Massachusetts, entered into correspondence with prominent teachers and educators respecting the advanced modes of teaching. He visited the schools almost daily, and in addressing schools used no bewildering preliminaries, but spoke directly to the point, and was never misunderstood. He wasted no words in apologies for telling teachers their faults. Glittering and elaborate advertisements of text-books had no influence on his selections, nor could gratuities from persistent agents corrupt him. They must be tested by his standard; he called to his assistance the best available talent, and they were thoroughly examined, and after weeks and sometimes months of patient labor his selections were made. A few years since Mr. Chandler asked to be relieved from serving on the committee longer, but at the last annual meeting of the district the expression was so unanimous that he should again serve them, although he has passed threescore and ten years, he has again buckled on his armor, which has never become rusty from inactivity. Owing to the small amount of schooling in the town where he spent his childhood, his education was necessarily limited, but his constant study of the text-books and his frequent visits to recitation-rooms, and the watchful interest he took in the advancement of the various classes, although his name does not appear on the school register as a pupil, it can be truly said that he was educated in our schools. He is social and domestic in his habits, is a lover of music and amusements, indulgent in his family, and liberal in his expenditures for their comfort and happiness. He is constitutionally honest and temperate in all things. His doors are wide open to his friends, and they are welcome to his pleasant fireside to enjoy his generous hospitality without restraint. Mr. Chandler is a benevolent man; by this the writer does not mean that he has become a life-member of all or any of the so-called charitable societies; he chooses to be the almoner of his own charities, and the worthy poor are never turned empty away; needed supplies have been found at more than one poor neighbor's door, and frequent donations that have come to them by no visible hand have generally been marked to the credit of some good angel. Some young men starting out in the battle of life, struggling for fame or fortune, will testify that they have found him a true friend in time of need.

Politically, Mr. Chandler is a Republican; was formerly a Whig. He attends the Congregational Church. Nov. 26, 1837, he united in marriage with Elizabeth Downing Furber, daughter of William and Alice C. Furber. Their family consisted of Mary Eliza, born Feb. 23, 1839, died Feb. 4, 1855; Charles Furber, born Jan. 15, 1841, and resides in St. Louis, Mo.; Arabella, wife of James Emery Randall, Esq., paymaster of the Great Falls Manufacturing Company (they have two children, Mary C. and Lizzie A.); and Albert F., born Dec. 7, 1844, and resides in Leadville, Col. Mrs. Chandler died March 2, 1873, and Sept. 25, 1876, Mr. Chandler married Charlotte M., daughter of Levi and Alice Coleman Cochrane, of Fayette, Me.

CHAPTER CVI.

STAFFORD!

STAFFORD was set off from the town of Barrington in 1820, Barrington being at that time twelve miles long and six and a half wide, the northern half constituting the town of Stafford.

The surface is greatly diversified into mountain, hill, and dale.

The Blue Hills, passing nearly through the centre, afford many grand and beautiful views to the lover of nature. Stafford has its share of the wild and grand scenery that so distinguishes the State of New Hampshire.

From the tops of the Blue Hills to the east a fine view of the southwest part of the State of Maine is presented, while to the southeast the ocean with its snowy sails is distinctly seen. To the south the highlands of Massachusetts and the Unconung Mountain, in Goolstown, rise to full view. To the west the Sunapee and Kearsarge Mountains rear their bald summits to the clouds, while to the north that Switzerland of America, the White Mountain region, towering above the rest of New England, meets the astonished gaze of the lover of the beautiful and sublime.

The days were when its brooks and ponds and shaded woods afforded rare sport to the hunter and fisherman, but those days are fast passing away. Its minerals are mostly locked up in its hills and mountains.

Several attempts have been made to unfold its treasures. Parties have prospected and sunk shafts; their success is their secret. There is, however, a mica-mine near Parker's Mountain that has attracted much attention. It is situated on the road leading from Stafford Ridge to Barnstead. It is being worked with good results. Some of the finest specimens in the country are taken from it. Much of the soil in the southern part is remarkably good. Its wheat, corn, and grazing lands are among the best in the State. Its fruit is abundant and varied. Its winter fruit has a reputation surpassed by none.

Stafford is noted for its fine stock, the Durham taking the lead for beef and working oxen, the Jerseys and Devons for dairy purposes. Frequently steers at three years old measure seven feet and upwards.

There are four roads extending through the town, in a northeasterly and southwesterly direction, nearly parallel to each other.

It is bounded on the east by Farmington and Rochester, on the south by Barrington, west by Northwood, and on the north by Barnstead.

Bow Lake Reservoir is a beautiful sheet of water about two miles long and one and a half wide, somewhat in the form of a crescent. The Cocheo Company of Dover controls its waters, which are carried to the city by the Isinglass River. There are several other similar ponds of less note, among which are Willey's and Spruce Ponds.

About fifty years ago the dam at Bow Lake gave way and its waters went rushing and roaring for eighteen miles to Dover, doing much damage in their course. The county immediately replaced the dam by one of granite, it being now one of the most substantial ones in this part of the country.

There are four stores in town at the present time doing an excellent business, and much lumber is being manufactured and transported to the various markets in this vicinity.

Farmington, Rochester, Great Falls, Dover, and Pittsfield are excellent markets for our farming products. Stafford is essentially a farming town, but there has been erected at Bow Lake an extensive building, and machinery is being now put in for the manufacture of shoes. The population of Stafford in 1881 was seventeen hundred and seventy.

When our fathers about one hundred and fifty years ago first made their advent into this town it was covered with noble forests, under whose shade the purling brooks, always full, went joyously on to the wide, wide sea. Then from necessity the first settlers laid low the tall trees, and the work of destruction has been going on from that day to this, and now the portable steam saw-mill has swept every vestige of everything that looks like a forest. Well may we exclaim, "Woodman, spare that tree!" As a consequence our brooks are diminishing in size and our springs are drying up, until at this writing, Aug. 14, 1882, after a sharp and somewhat protracted drought, there is hardly a brook in the town that has a continuous flow of water. I know whereof I write, having been over a large part of the town within the last two weeks.

There are nineteen school districts, and money is voted for schools liberally besides what the law requires us to raise.

In 1826 a terrible fire burned over Parker's Mountain, and the fire frequently caught a half-mile from the burning mountain. Those living at that time say the scene by night was indescribably grand. The fire continued to burn about a month.

I am told by the older people that the first settlers raised but very little corn or wheat, and hardly any potatoes. About eighty years ago the yellow potatoes were introduced into town, and were grown almost exclusively for a long time. Wheat and corn began to be raised after they began to plow the ground. Rye on the burn was their main crop. Beans were raised in abundance, hence bean-broth was one of their principal dishes. Their not raising potatoes or corn accounts for their small hogs. They ran in the woods, and seldom weighed over one hundred pounds. Sometimes they would get one up to one hundred and fifty pounds. That was a big hog for those days.

Strafford is a very healthy town, the water pure and cold, the mountain air pure and bracing; persons frequently live to be eighty or ninety, and some even to one hundred years of age.

There are two secret societies of the order of the Patrons of Husbandry, both in a flourishing condition, having halls of their own, one located at Strafford Corner, the other at Bow Lake.

There is one public-house, kept by John M. Whitehouse, near the foot of the Blue Hills, on the Crown Point road.

Manufacturing Interests.—There are seven mills where lumber is manufactured, four grist-mills, one cotton and wool carding mill, one barrel and shoox manufactory, two carriage manufactories. There is in the vicinity of Bow Lake iron ore in considerable quantities, also plumbago.

The rock of our mountains is mostly of coarse granite, although there are some of the finest and best granite to be found in the State. There is a quartz ledge in the northwest part of Strafford about half a mile in length, and has the appearance of a snow-bank in the summer from a distance.

I am indebted to Daniel Winkley, Esq., for the following early history of Strafford:

It appears that a ship of his Majesty King George II. put into Portsmouth Harbor, in need of repairs, and that a contract was made with the authorities of the town to repair the same and to receive in pay a tract of land now known as Barrington and Strafford, said tract being fourteen miles long by six and a half wide. Portsmouth having fulfilled its contract, a tax was levied on the inhabitants to pay for the same. After the tax was raised the said land was divided into lots in size proportional to the tax each man paid. The lots were numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, up to 277, that being the number of tax-payers. They now drew their numbers on the first range of lots on the east side of the town, and so continued till the ranges of a mile wide were laid off into lots and the land taken up, with the exception of lot of two miles wide running across the southerly end, nearly east and west, which was reserved to Portsmouth expressly to pay the expense of starting a foundry in that town.

In laying off the lots, when they came to a pond, as Ayers' Pond, in the first range of lots they surveyed, numbered its acres and led the lot in course beyond it. So of Round Pond and Bow Pond. Bow Pond and commons numbered in the survey nine hundred and sixty acres. A man by the name of Thomas Parker drew lot 149, containing six hundred and forty-eight acres, which happened to fall on the top of a mountain; hence the name of Parker's Mountain.

Some of the persons who owned these lots settled on them. I see many of the names of the first settlers among the original owners of the lots. Others threw them into the market. Hence it is that we hear so much about "taking up a farm," "settling on lots," "selecting homes" by the old people.

There are six ranges of lots one mile wide, the first commencing on the easterly side of the town. Then comes a range road nearly north and south, four rods wide, there being five of these roads, the half-mile on the westerly side not being laid off into lots. There is a cross-road running nearly east and west not far from the centre four rods wide. On the north side of this road in the fourth range of lots, between 156 (Joshua Preece's 720 acres) and 157, next south of cross-roads, lies a parsonage lot.

I will now give a list of the numbers of lots, with the original owners' names and number of acres, commencing on the easterly side of the town going up. I give an exact duplicate of the original, which lies before me:

No.	Original Owners' Name.	Acres.
1	Henry Heis	270
2	Thomas Hamet	60
3	John Moore	72
4	Francis Riss	60
5	Bonjoub Gandding	330
6	Elezzer Russell	96
7	Widow Hatch	60
8	Edward Gyles	240
9	William White	30
10	Nathaniel Rogers	360
11	James Lobbey	120
	Round Pond	(280 acres)
12	Samuel Alcock	210

The above is enough to show the transaction. There are two hundred and seventy-seven names, with number and acres attached, in the manuscript before me.

The plan of the town with the proportional size of the lots I have given a short account of. The manuscript and plan that I have, Daniel Winkley, Esq., says are exact duplicates of the originals. The originals were in the hands of Elijah Tuttle, an old man of Strafford, a professional and exact surveyor, and as he was about to die gave them to Mr. Winkley.

The story runs that John Foss, one of the original settlers, owned Bow Lake and sold it to John Caverly (4th), who sold it to the Cocheco Manufacturing Company, its present owners.

If the history of the contract between his Majesty King George the First and the town of Portsmouth is correct, and also the story of the survey, plot, and plan, and the laying off and assigning lots is true, then how did John Foss get his title to Bow Lake?

The plan exempts from sale the waters of the ponds in the tract of land under consideration. These ponds were surveyed, the number of acres given, and they never even went into the hands of the Portsmouth proprietors individually, and no man could give a title to them any more than to the ranges set off for roads, for there was no man ever had any legal title.

Family Sketches.—Joshua Otis, father of the Rev. Micajah, married Mary Hussey, of Barrington, had ten children.—Nicholas, Elijah, Paul, Micajah, Joshua, Stephen, Mary, Sarah, Jane, and Rebecca. He died with the measles, ninety years of age. Came from Dover and took up the farm upon which Jacob B. Smith now lives, and there lie his remains to-day. Micajah was a pioneer in organizing and sustaining the Free-Will Baptist Church at Strafford Corner.

He settled on land in the extreme southeast corner of Strafford; married Mary Foss, sister to Thomas Foss, better known in all this region as Master Foss. Master Foss had one son, John. He had two sons—John and Andrew. John was at one time warden of the State prison, at Concord. Andrew was a famous Abolition preacher and lecturer.

Micajah Otis, by his marriage with Sarah Foss, had six children, of whom the Hon. Jacob Otis was the eldest, who lived and died on the farm that his father had cleared up. Was born in 1810; married Sally Kimball, of Farmington. He was a real self-made man. Taught school twenty winters. Was one of the selectmen two years, and representative to the General Court two years prior to the division of the town. In 1828 was representative from Strafford, and afterwards counselor from the Second Counselor District three years. Was surveyor of land, justice of the peace, and drew up a large number of legal instruments, and also did a large probate business. He was a successful farmer, and died in 1854, and he sleeps with his fathers.

The Berrys are a numerous and respectable portion of the inhabitants of Strafford. Nathaniel and John were brothers, and came from Rye, and settled at Strafford Corner while as yet there were no public highways in this part of the town, both brothers having many descendants. John Berry had eight children, among whom was Thomas, father to Tamson, wife of Deacon Thomas Berry. Tamson still lives on the old homestead, a very aged and respectable lady.

Thomas had eighteen children by two wives. These children, with the exception of two, lived to become men and women, and settled in this vicinity.

Nathaniel, father of George, who was the father of Deacon Thomas, had thirteen children. Nathaniel, George, Thomas, and James Demeritt all lived and died on the old homestead. It now is being occupied by Dana R., a son of James Demeritt Berry. This family settled here over one hundred and seven years ago.

The Hayeses lived about one-half mile above Strafford Corner. This family was among the first settlers. John Hayes was an emigrant from Scotland, came to Dover, N. H., about 1680, lived and died there, married Mary Horne, and had a large family. His son, John<sup>2</sup> Hayes, lived in Dover, and was deacon of the first church. He married widow Tamson (Wentworth) Chesley, and had eleven children. One of these was Joseph<sup>3</sup> Hayes, born May 1, 1746, and lived in Strafford, N. H. He married, first, Peggy Brewster; second, Elizabeth Wingate. Had eight children, all by his first wife. Died July 30, 1816. His son Joseph, a strong-minded and upright man, had a family of twelve children. The homestead has now passed from the name.

Benjamin Stanton came from England, born in 1700, married a Ricker, had five children. The third, William, settled in Barrington, now Strafford, buying land of the town of Dover in 1754, showing a settlement of one hundred and twenty-eight years. Married, in 1761, a Brock. Their son William, Jr., lived at home and married a Holmes. They had eight children. The eldest, Ezra, still kept the old homestead, and married an Otis, and had seven children; one, Joshua O. Stanton, M.D., now a practicing physician in Washington, D. C., and another, William P., married a Brock, who, with their only child, Fred. T., who married a Young, live now on the farm reclaimed from the forests by their ancestors. This farm, one of the best and neatest kept in town, is a half-mile above Free-Will Baptist meeting-house at Strafford Corner.

The Young family living on the Crown Point road about one mile north of the Free-Will Baptist Church were among the first settlers. Stephen, who now occupies the old homestead, is eighty-one years of age. His grandfather, Benjamin, came from Dover, and had seven children, among whom was Elder Winthrop Young, born in Strafford, 1753; consequently this part of the town must have been settled by the family over one hundred and twenty-nine years.

Stephen Young's father's name was Jonathan, and had eight children, of whom two, Stephen and John F., are now living. Stephen had five children; John F. Young had four. John F. Young, Jr., is a prominent physician in the city of Newburyport, Mass.

Deacon Charles Scruton lives on the Crown Point road, near the top of the Blue Hill.

His great-great-grandfather's name was William; came from Ireland, and died in Barnstead with his daughter, Mrs. Drew. His son Thomas was born while crossing the water, settled in Strafford, where Deacon Charles now lives, died and was buried there.

Michael, son of Thomas and grandfather of Deacon Charles, was born on the home place Dec. 30, 1774, also died and was buried there.

Thomas Scruton, son of Michael, born Aug. 11, 1804, and now lives (1882, Aug. 16th) with his son, Deacon Charles Scruton, on the old homestead.

Oliver Foss, who lives on Strafford Ridge, on the farm reclaimed from the forests by his ancestors, is one of our best and neatest farmers. The soil by nature is excellent, and the best of care is taken of it. His great-grandfather, George, first settled in Portsmouth, then in Barrington, finally on the farm where Oliver now lives. Died and buried there in 1807, aged eighty-six. Had eleven children.

Oliver's grandfather had eight children. He lived, died, and was buried on the farm also. Oliver's father had five children,—Tobias (minister), Warren, William, Oliver, Mary. Oliver has one daughter, Helen, who married John C. Hayes. They live with Oliver, and have five children. These generations, most of them, settled in Strafford and vicinity.

Cotton Foss lives near the top of the Blue Hill, on the Ridge road. His father's name was George, who cleared up the farm where Cotton now lives. They have deeds showing the settlement of the farm, one hundred and two years ago. No road over the Blue Hills at that time. This branch of the Foss family settled first in Portsmouth, afterwards in Barrington, then in the part now called Strafford.

Bears were plenty at that time. Cotton's father the first year on his farm killed thirteen. Moose also were killed on the mountain.

George Cotton's father had six children, among them one daughter, Betsey, the only female, I am told, that was ever born on this farm for the one hundred and two years of its settlement. Cotton has three children living.—Paul M., in Boston, and Cotton, Jr., and Henry R., living on the homestead.

Paul Perkins lives near the top of the Blue Hill on the Ridge road, and now owns the home of his fathers. Lemuel Perkins, the great-grandfather, settled on the place one hundred and two years ago.

His grandfather's name was Paul, his father's name John. Five generations now lie in the graveyard near the house. His grandfather voted at every election for sixty-three years, and went twelve miles, part of the time on foot through the terrible snows and storms of March to reach his voting-place in Barrington. His father, John, voted fifty-five times without missing an election. Paul has voted thirty-one times, and through these generations not an election has been missed. They all always voted the Democratic ticket.

The Hon. Samuel P. Montgomery, a great-grandson of John Montgomery, one of the earliest settlers on Strafford Ridge, was born Jan. 9, 1806. His great-grandfather came to Strafford, settled on a farm, cleared it up, and his son Jonathan, grandfather of Samuel P., inherited it from his father, and John, the father of Samuel, succeeded to the property, and Samuel and David K. received it from their fathers. It has now gone out of the name.

Samuel P. was a noted teacher. He held all the offices of trust and responsibility in town several times over, also senator and representative to the Legislature. This family was among the first, if not the very first, to settle in Strafford.

John Caverno, one of the first settlers, a son of Arthur Caverno, of Scotch-Irish descent, from whom originated the Caverno family, came from the north of Ireland to this country about 1835.

John, son of Arthur, born in New Foundland in 1742, settled on the Canaan road about a mile south of Bow Lake, when the country was all a wilderness; married Sarah Tibbetts, of Barrington, 1746. They had two children,—Molly and Jeremiah. Jeremiah married Margaret Brewster. They had ten children,—John, Sarah, Lydia, Jeremiah, Polly, Arthur, George W., Margaret, Sullivan, and David B. Jeremiah succeeded his father on the old homestead.

John and George bought farms in the immediate neighborhood of the old homestead, upon which they lived and died, which are now occupied by their immediate descendants. Arthur was a Free-Will Baptist minister of note, settled and died in Dover. Sullivan is a prominent lawyer, and lives in Lockport, N. Y. The only male descendants living in town are Arthur and Jeremiah, sons of John Caverno, and George S., son of George W. Caverno. The Cavernos have always occupied a prominent position socially and politically.

Elijah Tuttle, Jr., son of Elijah Tuttle, of Barrington, was born July 10, 1774; married Sally Tasker April 5, 1798. The Tuttlés were originally from England. He was the first man in Strafford that ever received a collegiate education.

He was an expert in surveying, and did most of the business in that line in the westerly part of the town. His children were Samuel, William, Mary, Jehoah, Sarah, Asa, and Ester; nearly all lived and died in Strafford. His descendants still live on the old homestead, which is situated near Bow Lake.

Rufus Hall, son of Israel Hall and grandson of John Hall, lives on the Province road near the upper end of Bow Lake; married Mary Ann Young, of Barrington. They had two children,—David O. and Frank H. Frank lives with his father; married Josephine Elliot, of Barnstead; have one child, John, the grandfather of Rufus, born Jan. 18, 1739; cleared up the farm where Rufus now lives. His father, Israel, born July 20, 1768, also lived and died on the homestead. They have been an industrious, frugal, and respectable family.

Aaron Waldron, one of the first settlers, born Aug. 4, 1749, took up his farm near the northwesterly part of the town. Hannah, his wife, was born March 29, 1750, by whom he had thirteen children, namely,—Azariah, Aaron, Isaac, John, Abram, Robert, Abram (2d), William, Hannah, Richard, Lovey, Zachariah, and Sarah, the only living child, who married James B. Foss, of Strafford Ridge. Azariah, the eldest, was the first representative of the town after its separation from Barrington. These children settled in town, and all the Waldrons in Strafford are descendants of Aaron. The grandchildren now living in town are Jonathan C., Azariah, and William W. Waldron.

This family is one of the most numerous and respectable in town. We have endeavored to trace the history of some of the prominent early settlers, have consulted the most reliable records and many of the oldest inhabitants, and after all much, at this late day, must depend upon tradition. Every one who has given the subject thought knows the difficulties in the way.

We might mention among other prominent families of the early settlers the Pershleys, Brocks, Hams, Scotts, Babbs, Stileses, Slopers, Taskers, Huckinses, Holmeses, Boodys, Buzzels, Caverlys, Caswells, Cates, Critchets, Evanses, Hills, Jennesses, Pillsburys, Roberts, Shackfords, Smiths, Swains, Browns, Twomblys, Leightons, Joneses, and Walkers.

Many of the sons of Stratford occupy places of respectability and trust in various parts of the country. Among them may be mentioned Drs. Joshua O. Stanton, Jr., John F. Young, Jr., Stephen Young, E. Frank Foss, George H. Montgomery, Jeremiah C. Garland. Lawyers, Robert E. Foss, Winship Twombly, Charles Caverno, Zachariah B. Caverly, Secretary of Legation to Peru; Levi B. Tasker, Free-Will Baptist clergyman; Tobias Foss.

Ecclesiastical and Educational.—The Free Baptist Church at Stratford Corner (then called Crown Point, Barrington) was organized in August, 1779, under the supervision of Rev. Edward Lock. It was composed of a branch of the Calvin Baptist Church of Berwick, Me., numbering about forty, joined by a number of converts, the fruit of a revival at Stratford. It was constituted an independent body of Christians, taking the name of "Baptist Church" only.

Rev. Tozer Lord was its first pastor. Rev. Benjamin Randall, the founder of the Free Baptist denomination, was then a member of the Berwick Calvin Baptist Church in good standing. He applied for a letter of dismission to go with the branch of said church to form the "Free Church" at Crown Point, as it was called. But no notice seemed to be taken of his request. In the month of March following, he united with said Free Church without a letter. Having preached quite successfully for more than three years in several places in and around Barrington, the church with which he had just before united and "many of his townsmen," requested his ordination. He was accordingly set apart as an evangelist at New Durham, on the 5th of April, 1780. The ordination sermon and charge to the candidate was by his pastor of the Barrington Church, the Rev. T. Lord.

Although the New Durham Church, being the first that Randall organized, is called the "first" and "mother church" of the Free Baptists, yet the church at Stratford Corner, N. H., was really the first and pioneer body of the sect of Christians called Free Baptists. It was organized on precisely the same principles as at New Durham, about ten months before that was, and gave to the world one of its members as the founder of said denomination. By its vote and through its pastor it ordained and gave ecclesiastical authority to the honored leader to found other churches, and to administer the ordinances of the church. Randall had the oversight of said church, and preached more or less to it for many years, and once, when scattered and nearly destroyed by "Shakerism," nine of its members signed a request to the church at New Durham for "help." Randall soon went to their aid. He probably reorganized them into a church, as the records soon speak of this as the "second church." The record of said reorganization and of a few subsequent years cannot be found; but of said reorganization there is no doubt, for the Free Baptist history (page 69) says of this point, "The London and Canterbury churches could do no otherwise than follow the example of the Stratford church;" . . . "these reorganized churches continue unto the present time" [date of history, 1861].

So the proof of this claim of the Stratford Corner Church to be the oldest and "mother of us all" is clear.

This church has kept on its course, with a few reverses, now (1882) for one hundred and three years. Soon after its organization it was much weakened and reduced to a few in number by secession for cause before named. But extensive revivals under Randall and others gathered many into this fold of Christ. At times more than one hundred and sixty members have been reported. A few years after it was formed two other churches, composed in part of members dismissed from this, were organized, one at the southern part of the town of Barrington and one in the northern part, now called the "Stratford and Barnstead Church." Later, two others were constituted in town, one at the centre of Stratford and the other at Bow Lake. Still the "mother church" has (in 1882) a membership of eighty-five. Whole number of members in the four churches in town is three hundred and forty-three.

It is claimed by the oldest inhabitants in the community that "the first persons baptized by immersion in the town [Stratford then was included in Barrington] were Ralph Hall, an aged man, Mrs. Anna Young, wife of Benjamin Young, and Miss Abigail Daniels, a young lady." This was in about 1776. Rev. E. Smith administered the ordinance, an "opposing multitude" witnessing the services. Mr. Hall joined "the free church" at Stratford Corner. He lived, died, and is buried with his wife on the place where Mr. John Hall lives, his great-great-grandson. Four generations have lived there in succession, all members of the church, and its firm and liberal supporters. A granddaughter of the first-named Ralph, Miss Sarah Hall, married Rev. Mr. Boardman, D.D., of the Baptist mission in Asia, and after his death she married Rev. A. Judson, D.D., the celebrated pioneer in said mission.

Among the laymen of this church there were persons of marked ability. We have space to name but one, the Hon. Jobe Otis. (See his name elsewhere in this history.)

This church has sent out a number of ministers who have done good service for the world, among whom are Benjamin Randall, Micajah Otis, Winthrop Young, Nathaniel Berry, Enoch Place, John Nutter, Ephraim H. Heart, Hiram Holmes, John C. Holmes (brothers), and perhaps others, all of whom are dead, leaving an honorable record so far the writers know.

Benjamin Randall, the first named, was the founder of the Free Baptist denomination. For more extended information of him the reader is referred to "The Life of Randall," and the "History of the Free-Will Baptists," published by the Free-Will Baptist printing establishment, Dover, N. H.

We make a short extract from history: "Randall was a man of medium size, or a little below, erect and gentlemanly in appearance. His features were sharp, his eyes of a hazel color, and the general expression of his countenance was grave and dignified. His deep piety and fervent spirit gave a characteristic sweetness to his voice, and he usually wept as he preached. His gestures were few, and as a speaker he was calm, argumentative, and very impressive. His perception was great, and his memory strong. He was somewhat nervous in temperament, quite sanguine in his opinions, very conscientious in what he thought was right, and his reproofs were often administered with cutting severity. He had a good business education for his times. He studied the works of men, but was emphatically a man of one book, and that was the Bible."

At first, religious meetings were held in school-houses and private dwellings. A few years after its organization, the church, in connection with a school district, built what was called "The Temple," the pews being arranged on the three sides of the house, and the school desks in the centre. It was located a few rods southeast from where Benjamin F. Wankley, Esq., now lives (1882), on the opposite side of the road. It is now removed. Their meeting-house, recently put in good repair, was erected in 1835.

The names of the pastors of the Strafford Corner Church and the time of service, as near as can be ascertained, are as follows: Revs. Tozer Lord, from 1779 to 1781; Benjamin Randall, associated with Micajah Otis from 1783 to 1821; Enoch Place, till 1833; D. L. Edgerley, till 1857; A. R. Pradbury, till 1858; E. Place, till 1861; N. C. Twombly, till 1863; B. Van Dame, till 1865; B. B. Smith, till 1868; William T. Smith, till 1869; N. C. Lothrop, till 1873; Ezra Tuttle, till 1874; S. N. Brooks, till 1876; C. C. Foster, till 1878; E. Third Free-Will Baptist Church in Strafford.—This church was formerly a part of the First Free-Will Baptist Church.

Jan. 20, 1819, a request was made by the people of Strafford Ridge to the New Durham Quarterly Meeting for a separation and for the organizing of a separate church at that place, not because of any difficulty among them as to divisions or disputes, but for convenience and better accommodations. This request was granted, and Elders Place, Merrill, and Peavey were appointed a committee to meet the people at the Ridge on the first Saturday in February, 1819, to acknowledge them the Third Church and to assist them in organizing.

The meeting was organized on the above date by choosing Rev. Enoch Place moderator, and Rev. J. L. Peovey clerk. (From the records.) "Now when the brethren had gathered together at the school-house on the Ridge, on the 1st Saturday in February, 1819, agreeable to appointment, they came to the following conclusion by the Grace of God.

"We, whose names are hereafter subscribed, having given ourselves unto the Lord, do give ourselves to one another in the Lord, by the will of God, considering ourselves a church of Christ, intending to watch over one another in love, striving together for the things which make for peace and things whereby we may edify one another. Owning the Scriptures to be our rule of faith and practice and all the saints of God our brethren, we intend to comfort ourselves in the Lord together and edify one another even as also we do. And to know them which labor among us and are over us in the Lord and admonish, and to esteem them very highly for their work sake and be at peace among ourselves. To warn them that are unruly, comfort the feeble-minded, support the weak, be patient to all men. To render not evil for evil to any man, but ever follow that which is good, both among ourselves and to all men, praying the God of love and peace to aid us in all our journey from this to the eternal world, and preserve us blameless soul, body, and spirit unto his heavenly kingdom."

The following is a list of ministers who have been settled over this church, with date of settlement: Revs. Enoch Place, 1819; Ammi R. Bradbury, 1855; Arthur Caverno, 1858; D. P. Harriman, 1859; Uriah Chase, 1865; I. M. Redell, 1866; Caleb C. Foster, 1872; C. E. Handy, 1873; S. C. Kimball, 1875; L. H. Henslow, 1880.

During the thirty-six years' pastorate of the Rev. Enoch Place he preached but one-half the time, two Sabbaths per month; the other Sabbaths the pulpit was occupied at intervals by Elders Sherburn, P. S. Burbank, John Winkley, Nathan Caverno, and others.

The first clerk of this church was William Foss (3d), 1819, succeeded by Rev. Enoch Place, 1821; William B. Foss, 1842; J. H. Montgomery, 1845; Warren Foss, 1848; Alfred Tasker, 1877, present clerk.

The first church was built in 1800. It was a large church, with square high-backed pews, and a gallery running round three sides of the house. There were no means of lighting or heating; evening service and service during severe weather being held in the academy. The pulpit was high and elaborate.

This church was taken down in 1857, and a new church built, in which service is held at the present time.

The Bow Lake meeting-house was erected in 1843, as a Union Church, and occupied as such till 1859.

Rev. John Caverly and Enoch Place, Free-Will Baptists, and the Rev. George W. Ashby, Baptist, occupied the pulpit.

In 1859 the Bow Lake Free-Will Baptist Church was organized, with Rev. Levi B. Tasker as pastor, William P. Hall, deacon, and Orin T. Hill, clerk.

The meeting-house was dedicated to the Free-Will Baptists, Nov. 14, 1859. The church, when organized, consisted of twenty-four members, as follows: L. B. Tasker, M. H. Tasker, W. P. Hall, Eliza Hall, C. M. Thompson, Dyre Hall, Daniel D. Caverly, Orin T. Hill, Mary E. Hill, Reuben Critchett, Betsey Critchett, George W. Buzzell, Mary Babb, Jeremiah Caverno, Dolly H. Caverno, Almira J. Hill, Elizabeth Roberts, M. A. Hinckins, C. A. Hill, A. W. Hill, Susan Roberts, William Thompson, Mary Tasker, and Deborah Thompson.

The Rev. L. B. Tasker presided over the church as pastor for three years, and was succeeded by Rev. Joseph Brown.

In 1864, Samuel B. Gray was chosen second deacon. Rev. Joseph Brown remained as pastor till 1865. Since then the successions have been Revs. C. C. Edgerly, Levi Brackett, Thomas Keniston, D. I. Quint, Frank Browne, Edwin Smith, Royal McDonald, and W. F. Young.

Deacon William P. Hall died June 17, 1873, and William Cate was chosen his successor Sept. 17, 1873. Present membership sixty-four.<sup>1</sup>

A church was organized in North Strafford, consisting of seventy members, early in the summer of 1781, and Elder Joseph Boody was its pastor for thirty years, since which time what few records there are are singularly deficient in anything that can be called church history.

Strafford Union Academy, situated on Strafford Ridge, was incorporated in 1832. The names of the individuals who procured the act of incorporation were William Foss, Daniel Winkley, Job Otis, Enoch Place, Samuel P. Montgomery, John Caverly, B. W. Jenness.

The act was changed, and the name adopted was Strafford Academy. The change was made to enable the corporation to hold more property than the first act permitted. The institution was very successful for many of the first years of its existence. A Mr. Austin, of Portsmouth, N. H., left to the institution a legacy of five thousand dollars.

There arising some division among the stockholders, the money never has been received. In the mean time the academy has ceased to be what it was in its early days. It is considered a Free-Will Baptist institution.

There was a Methodist Church organized, and a meeting-house built, half a mile above Strafford Corner, about fifty years ago, but the church and the meeting-house have long since been numbered among the things that were.

DANIEL WINKLEY, son of Deacon John Winkley, was born on the "old home" in what is now the town of Strafford, N. H., May 26, 1792. His ancestor, Samuel Winkley (spelled sometimes Winkley), was the origin of the large family of that name in America. He came from Lancashire, England, to Portsmouth, N. H., about 1680. The family coat-of-arms is thus described: "An eagle displayed, counter eranged; argent; gules. Motto, 'sper.'" Samuel settled first in Kittery, Me., where, in 1684, he married Sarah, daughter of Francis Trickey. They lived on Crooked Lane, on a lot of land granted to her father by the town of Kittery in 1656. They afterwards removed to Portsmouth, where he engaged in trade and commerce, and died in 1736, over seventy years old. They had children,—Samuel<sup>2</sup>, Francis<sup>1</sup> (born 1689, died April 22, 1776), Nicholas, William, Sarah (married Tobias Langdon, father of Governor John Langdon), Elizabeth (married Samuel Weeks, of Boston). His will, dated Portsmouth, N. H., Nov. 13, 1722, contains a clause giving his son Francis a Bible which was his father's, and this Bible is now in possession of a descendant in Barrington. Francis Winkley succeeded to the land of his grandfather Trickey, in Kittery. His occupation was boat-building. His brothers all dying young, he also is the common ancestor of all the Winkleys of this stock. He married Mary, daughter of Rev. John Emerson, of Portsmouth. They had seven children,—John (born 1726, died March 31, 1811, aged eighty-five), Elizabeth (born 1728, died at Barrington, 1806, aged seventy-eight), Samuel (born March 9, 1731, died Nov. 29, 1807, aged seventy-six), Francis<sup>2</sup> (born 1733, died Oct. 9, 1818, aged eighty-five), Mary (born 1736, died in Boston, Dec. 1, 1776, aged forty), Emerson (born 1738, died at Barrington, Sept. 17, 1810, aged seventy-two), and Sarah (born 1740, died Feb. 6, 1803, aged sixty-three).

Samuel Winkley, son of Francis<sup>1</sup>, was a joiner, serving his time with Mark Langdon, of Portsmouth. He married Mary, daughter of Samuel Brewster and Margaret Waterhouse, 1 is wife, of that place, and, tradition says, granddaughter of Elder John Brewster of the "Mayflower." She was born April 13, 1734, and died Nov. 3, 1816, aged eighty-two. Her maternal great-grandfather, Richard Waterhouse, owned and occupied Pierce's Island, near Portsmouth, in 1688. Samuel Winkley settled in Barrington, was a pioneer farmer, and with patient and untiring energy carved a home for his children from the primitive forest. The children of this worthy couple were Samuel<sup>1</sup>, Francis (a Shaker elder), Mehetable, William, John, Elizabeth, Benjamin, David, and Mary. John, born Nov. 17, 1766, attained the age of seventy-six years, dying Jan. 8, 1843; was for many years a farmer in Strafford. Possessed of great natural abilities and physical strength, he was blest with content, and by diligence and much hard work was successful financially. He cared nothing for political strife, but was deeply religious, carrying his Christianity into his daily life. He was for many years a pillar of the First Free-Will Baptist Church, and was ever its deacon. The people of the community were unanimous in pronouncing "Deacon John Winkley one of the 'salt' of the earth." He married Mary, daughter of Richard Swain, of Barrington, Nov. 14, 1791. They had nine children, six attaining maturity. At present writing (1882) but two (the oldest and the youngest), Daniel and Mary A. (Mrs. D. K. Montgomery, of Portsmouth), are living. Daniel Winkley was educated at Phillips' Exeter Academy; has always been a farmer; when a young man, as all true types of New England do, taught district school, and for thirteen consecutive winter terms. He has in his long and industrious life engaged in numerous avocations, as carpenter, painter, etc.; as surveyor has perhaps run more lines than any other in the county, and still, at more than ninety years, can do his work as well as when but forty. He married, March 20, 1816, Sarah, daughter of Hon. Job Otis, and settled in Oxford, N. H., where their three children, Otis P., John A., and Daniel S., were born (the two last are dead). Mr. Winkley moved to Strafford again in 1824, and lived with his parents, taking charge of their affairs, remaining until 1857. He was chosen selectman in 1832-33, 1839-40; representative to State Legislature in 1834-35; has been justice of the peace, justice of the quorum, or notary public, consecutively from 1834. In early life he was a Federalist in politics, later on a Whig, and was one of seven in town to first espouse the Free-Soil movement, and from the formation of the Republican party has been unswervingly true to its teachings. He was nominated by the Whigs for State Senator in 1840, and in two years reduced the Democratic majority from five hundred to fifty. But it was his interest in education and his connection with Strafford Union Academy that makes him most endeared to the people of his native town. He was the principal one to secure its location by the Free-Will Baptist Church; when the church withdrew he again was one of the principal actors in saving the school, and no man has expended more, in proportion to his ability, than he, that the rising generation might be properly educated. He was made one of the trustees of the academy on organization, and still holds that position. Independent in religious belief, he is broad and charitable, and ever esteemed for his personal worth and excellence of character. He removed to Malden, Mass., in 1857, stayed there nine years, then returned to Strafford, where, strong in mind and young in appearance, and with the wife with whom he has lived sixty-six years, is, from the stand-point of ninety years, looking forward to the last twilight of life with trusting confidence.

The first delegates to the Constitutional Convention to revise the Constitution of New Hampshire were Penning W. Jenness, Samuel P. Montgomery. The delegates for revision, in 1876, were Aaron W. Foss, Jacob B. Smith.

From the town records we find that Job Otis, Azariah Waldron, Tobias Roberts, by act of the Legislature of New Hampshire, were authorized to call the first town-meeting.

In 1827, at a special meeting called for the purpose, it was voted "that no ardent spirit be sold within one-half mile of the place of the town meeting." Also the following is from the records:

"STRAFFORD, March 1, 1827.

"This may certify that we the subscribers solemnly approve of George W. Foss to be a suitable person to sell and mix spiritous liquors such as rum, wine, brandy, gin for two days at the Edge Meeting-House on the 11th and 12th days of March inst.

The Bow Lake Building Association at Bow Lake was organized the present year. Its object was to build a suitable building for manufactory of ladies' and misses' boots and shoes, and to give the rent for a term of years to responsible parties who would come there and occupy and carry on the shoe business. The capital stock is divided into shares of twenty-five dollars each, to enable men of small means to take stock and encourage the enterprise. The officers of the association are: President, John W. Jewell; Vice-President, John F. Munson; Secretary, John E. Waldron; Treasurer, John W. Perry; Board of Directors, Azariah Waldron, Dearborn D. Caswell, Jonathan C. Waldron, Alonzo M. Foss, Daniel S. Woodman, John D. Clarke, James Walker, and Daniel Clay.

The shoe manufactory built at Bow Lake by the Bow Lake Building Association the present year, and just completed, is thirty feet wide, sixty feet long, two stories high, with a basement, and is to be run by steam-power. It is capable of accommodating from seventy-five to one hundred hands. Messrs. Austin & Parker, of Lynn, Mass., are to move here and occupy it, and will carry on the manufactory of ladies' and misses' kid and goat boots for the New England trade. They are young men thoroughly acquainted with the business, and there is no reason why they will not succeed. They are backed by some of the best citizens with all the capital they need.

HON. BENNING WENTWORTH JENNESS.

Hon. Benning Wentworth Jenness was born in Deerfield, N. H., July 14, 1806. He received a good education at Bradford Academy, leaving there to begin business for himself at the early age of sixteen. In 1823 he moved to Strafford, where he successfully followed a general mercantile business for more than thirty years. He was postmaster of the place for fifteen years; represented the town repeatedly in the lower branch of the State Legislature, beginning at the age of twenty-one. He held the office of high sheriff for five years in old Strafford County, which has since been divided into Belknap, Carroll, and Strafford Counties. After leaving that office he was appointed judge of probate, which position he retained five years, and then resigned to accept senatorial honors, although the terms of office were such that he could have remained in the former office until he was seventy years of age. In 1845 he was appointed United States senator, to fill the unexpired term of Hon. Levi Woodbury, appointed to the United States Supreme Court. In 1846 he was the Democratic candidate for United States senator, to succeed himself, but was defeated by a coalition of Whigs and Free-Soilers. In 1847 he was candidate for United States Congress, receiving a plurality of votes, but, as the Constitution required a majority for election, there was no choice. A special election was holden, and again no choice, then the Legislature passed a law that a plurality should elect members to Congress, but the Whigs and Free-Soilers combined and he was defeated. In 1850 he was a member of the Constitutional Convention, at Concord, N. H., appointed to revise the Constitution of the State.

At the Democratic National Convention of 1852 the choice of a candidate for President of the United States was left by common consent to the New Hampshire delegation, and a caucus was called to choose the coming man. The names of Franklin Pierce and B. W. Jenness were presented. The balloting commenced; there were nine delegates, and the chairman not voting, the ballot stood four for each candidate; the chairman was called upon, and he gave a vote for Mr. Pierce, which nominated him and made him President. Had Mr. Jenness received that one vote, he would in all probability have been elected President.

He was nominated for Governor of New Hampshire in 1861, but withdrew in favor of Gen. Stark, in a letter to the New Hampshire Gazette, dated Strafford, February 8th, which showed a statesman's comprehension of the critical events of the times, a wonderful knowledge of constitutional law, and a love for the Union exceeded by none.

After the above date he retired to private life, although often importuned to be a candidate for different offices.

Judge Jenness moved to Cleveland, Ohio, to attend to the management of his financial interests, already large in that locality, in 1862, and at once engaged extensively in the lumber business, superintending the Cleveland branch, under the firm-name of B. W. Jenness & Co., while his partners attended to the manufacturing at the mills in Michigan. They did an extensive and profitable business.

Judge Jenness remained in Cleveland until his decease, Nov. 16, 1879. At a meeting of the board of lumber dealers, to pay a tribute of respect to his memory, the remarks were highly eulogistic of his life and character, and proper resolutions were adopted.

His remains were removed to Strafford, N. H., where, on the ensuing Sabbath, services were held at the Baptist Church. Rev. E. C. Cogswell, of Northwood, delivered an eloquent sermon, and the remains were interred in the family cemetery on the Shackford-Jenness homestead, where is erected a fine monument.

In 1827, Judge Jenness married Miss Nancy Walker Shackford, a daughter of Samuel Shackford, Esq., of Strafford, N. H. She was a lady of fine education and cultivation. She died at Cleveland, May 25, 1868, and her remains are deposited by the side of her husband.

Of their two surviving children, Ellen married Hon. H. B. Wiggin, of Orange, N. J.; Annie married Dr. H. L. Ambler, of Cleveland, Ohio, Sept. 9, 1869. He married Mira, daughter of Joshua and Martha (Huckins) Woodman, of Strafford. She is a woman of rare amiability, and thoroughly devoted to her gifted husband. They had one child, Bessie W., who inherits many of her father's personal characteristics.

Judge Jenness was a gentleman in the highest sense of the word; not only his public but his private life manifested this fully. Kind-hearted and generous to the poor, none ever went from his door hungry. He was a man of excellent judgment and good business ability, quick to decide and act, and possessed of so much nobleness of character and genial frankness that it was a real pleasure to counsel with him and to receive his advice. His was an hospitable nature, and his ardent and active temperament was as earnestly engaged in securing the comfort of all by whom he was surrounded as in the complicated and multifarious affairs of his immense business. His was a pleasant and happy home, made more so by his inestimable wife, who always anticipated his every want, and in his last illness watched over him with the devotion and tenderness that only a loving wife can give to a beloved husband. This tribute to his memory in this historical work is contributed by her. He was rarely angry, having a most genial disposition, and by his death the whole country lost one of its profoundest statesmen, the community an unusually useful citizen, his extended circle of friends one whose place can never be fully filled, and his family a model husband and father.

JOHN WOODMAN JEWELL.

John Woodman Jewell, son of Milton and Nancy (Colley) Jewell, was born at Bow Lake, Strafford, N. H., July 26, 1831. His paternal grandfather, Simeon, was born in Brentwood, N. H., July 20, 1776; married Jane French (born in Salisbury, Mass., Oct. 28, 1766, died at Sanbornton, N. H., Jan. 11, 1838) at Deerfield, N. H., May 19, 1796, and soon afterward settled in Northfield, N. H., as a farmer. After some years' residence there he moved to Sanbornton, where he died at about the age of sixty-six years, Sept. 10, 1832. He left four children,—John, Milton, Betsey, and Samuel F.,—and was known and prized for his probity and quiet, unassuming honesty and rectitude. His son, Milton, was born in Northfield, July 2, 1803. When about eighteen, Milton was apprenticed to learn the business of tanning and currying, after acquiring which he worked for a few years in Deerfield at his trade. In 1828 he came to Strafford, located at Bow Lake, and established a tannery there, with which he coupled the manufacturing of boots and shoes. He prospered in business until 1832, when the large dam of the Cocheo Manufacturing Company, at the outlet of Bow Lake, gave way, and his property was almost entirely ruined by the flood of escaping water. After this event he only followed his trade in a small way, but continued doing something until 1865, when, his health growing very poor, he closed his business, and June 4, 1869, passed away, leaving to his descendants the record of an untarnished name. He married, Dec. 24, 1830, Nancy, daughter of Richard and Sarah Colley, of Madbury. She was born May 3, 1808, and died in Barrington, April 7, 1880. Their nine children were John W., Hannah E. (died young), Mary J. (Mrs. Wingate T. Preston, of Barrington), Asa W. (superintendent of water for Cocheo Manufacturing Company, at Dover), Charles M. (deceased), Cyrena T. (deceased), Enoch T. (deceased), Betsey A. (deceased), and Samuel F., of Barrington. Mr. Jewell was an unyielding Democrat. Both he and his wife were for years valued members of the Free-Will Baptist Church, and he was universally known as one of the most benevolent of men, and an accommodating neighbor. His honesty was so rigid as to make him almost unjust to himself. Pleasant and social in his intercourse with all, he was highly esteemed.

John W. Jewell early learned to labor. When but five years old he was tied in a chair and set to drive a horse to grind bark in his father's tan-yard, and from that day onward he has never shrank from earnest discharge of such of life's laborious duties as have fallen to his lot. He early and thoroughly learned his father's trade. When he was eighteen, his father consenting, he commenced working for himself on a farm. After a short time he was taken ill, and returned home. The next spring he expended the money he had then earned in attending Gilmanton Academy. Then for three successive summers he worked in a steam saw-mill, teaching school during the winter, and in the spring and fall attending Strafford Seminary (now Austin Academy) and Gilmanton Academy. In 1853 he went to Newmarket as "second hand" in the cloth-room of the Newmarket Manufacturing Company, but soon went to Manchester, whence in a very short period of time he returned to Newmarket, and spent one year as clerk for S. A. & B. F. Haley, merchants; then, at the urgent request of Hon. B. W. Jenness, the leading business man of Strafford, he entered his employ, and remained with him until 1864, when Mr. Jenness removed to Ohio, and Mr. Jewell purchased his stock of goods at Bow Lake, and has been since, and now is, the leading merchant of the town.

He has been successful and popular. His counsel has been valued and sought in every important matter in town for years, and his cautious and at the same time progressive advice has been of public and private benefit. He is one of the standard-bearers of the Democracy of this section, and has often been honored by political trust. He has been moderator, superintendent of schools, and selectman. He represented Strafford in the State Legislature of 1862, and was sheriff of Strafford County from 1874 to 1876. He was placed in nomination in 1878 by the Democratic Senatorial Convention as its candidate for State senator, and received by far the largest number of votes cast, but failed of an election, as he had not a majority, but a plurality,—a third ticket (Greenback) drawing sufficient votes to defeat him. For ten years he was postmaster under Pierce, Buchanan, and Johnson, and for a number of years has been a member of the Democratic State Committee.

He married, Oct. 9, 1853, Sarah Folsom Gale, daughter of Bartholomew Gale, of Upper Gilmanton, now Belmont. They have three children,—Sarah A. (born Aug. 21, 1856; married Rev. W. W. Browne, of Evansville, Wis., now pastor of Free-Will Baptist Church at Gonie, N. H.), John Herbert (born Sept. 10, 1859; now partner with his father in merchandising under the firm-title of J. W. Jewell & Son), and Mertie Folsom (born Sept. 10, 1859).

Mr. Jewell has ever been active in all matters for the improvement and advancement of his town and county, and is, in the best sense of the word, a "self-made man." Commencing life without a dollar, he is to-day in ample circumstances, the result of his business energy and thrift, and is one of the largest tax-payers in town. He occupies a very prominent position in social, political, and business circles, and is probably more extensively acquainted and known by a wider range of people than any other resident of Strafford. He is one of his native town's best representatives, is a member of United Order of Golden Cross, director in Northwood Mutual Benefit Association, and president of Bow Lake Building Association. To Mr. Jewell are the people of Bow Lake largely indebted for the shoe manufactory just completed, which, beyond doubt, will prove one of the most important industries of the future here. Through his efforts entirely have the Boston and Northern Telephone Company extended their lines to Bow Lake.

AARON WALDRON FOSS.

Aaron Waldron Foss, son of James B. Foss and Sarah, daughter of Aaron Waldron, was born July 20, 1824, on the homestead owned by several generations of his paternal ancestors at Strafford Centre, N. H. He unites in his veins the blood of three of the most distinguished early families,—the Waldrons, the Fosses, and the Boodeys. (See Robert B. Caverly's "Annals of the Boodey Family.")

Aaron Waldron, from whom Mr. Foss was named, was born Aug. 7, 1749. He was a thrifty husbandman who, in offices of trust and otherwise, held the confidence of his townsmen. His homestead was in the north part of the town. He married Azariah Boodey's daughter Hannah (Azariah was son of Zechariah Boodey, the original American progenitor of the name, who came a boy-emigrant from France, and a deserter from the French ship on which he was shipped, at Boston, in the latter part of the seventeenth century, and settled in the wilds of Madbury). She was born March 29, 1758. They reared twelve children in health and vigor in their early pioneer life. Of these Sarah, born Jan. 14, 1802, was youngest. Aaron Waldron was killed by a falling tree Dec. 9, 1820. His widow died Feb. 7, 1830.

George Foss, of Rye, born May 10, 1721, married Mary Martin, born Sept. 20, 1726. Their children were Rachel (born Jan. 16, 1747, married a Berry), Judith (born May 19, 1748, married a Berry), John (born Sept. 14, 1752), Abigail (born May 9, 1754, married a Perkins), George (born Oct. 9, 1757), William and Richard (twins, born May 15, 1760), James (born May 1, 1762), Mary (born Aug. 13, 1764, married William Foss), Samuel and Nathan (born Aug. 13, 1766). He settled on Strafford Ridge, in old Barrington, on the lot of one hundred acres now occupied by Oliver Foss. He was a very good farmer, and served his day and generation with acceptability. His son Nathan became a farmer on a small farm of sixty-six acres, to which he made several additions; married Alice, daughter of William and Jemima Babb, had children—three sons and three daughters—James B., George B., Richard, Sally (Mrs. William Foss), Eliza (Mrs. Joshua Foss), Harriet (Mrs. Cotton H. Foss). James B., born Oct. 1, 1795, became a farmer, had the simple educational instructions of that primitive day, married Sarah Waldron April 6, 1824, when about twenty-five years old. They had five children that attained maturity.—Aaron W., Hannah W. (Mrs. Joseph Stiles), Richard W., Adeline W. (Mrs. Charles A. Hill), Mary A. (Mrs. Gilbert Shaw). Mr. Foss lived with his father, and succeeded to the paternal lands. Like his father he worked hard, and with the primitive tools of that period wrought early and late. The hoes of that time were pounded out of iron by a blacksmith, and were fastened to a rude handle with a large "eye." The first hoe he used his father made for him out of red oak, and the edge was hardened by fire. James became a great land-owner, used to deal largely in poultry, which he conveyed to Boston; was a shrewd, successful man of business, represented Strafford in 1842-43 in the General Court, was selectman four years, has been for years a consistent member of the Free-Will Baptist Church, and has at one time owned four hundred broad acres of land. He is now living, with good memory and well-preserved faculties, at eighty-seven years of age.

Aaron W. Foss passed his childhood and youth at his father's home, receiving the educational advantages of common schools and Austin Academy, and about his twenty-first year became interested in cattle-droving in connection with farming. His natural shrewdness and business qualities were manifested in making this largely remunerative, and with a modest and unostentatious nature he is one of Strafford's most successful sons. He married, Aug. 12, 1849, Elizabeth O., daughter of Rev. John and Nancy (French) Caverly. Their children are Clara C. (Mrs. Calvin Rea, deceased); Albert C., born Oct. 12, 1851, married Lillie E. Tasker; Sarah A., born Aug. 28, 1853 (Mrs. George W. Brock); John James, born Nov. 12, 1855; and Aaron H., born Oct. 31, 1857. Mr. Foss has made himself prominent in community not only by acquiring wealth, but by his hearty co-operation with every laudable enterprise and his wise counsels. He represented Strafford in the State Legislatures of 1856 and 1857; was a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1876; selectman two years, and has acted formerly with the Whig party, but of latter years with the Democrats, with whom he is in perfect sympathy. For several years he has been secretary and treasurer (as well as member) of the board of trustees of Austin Academy.

In April, 1861, all his buildings were swept away by fire, but a new and pleasant home has risen on the site of the former. Enterprising and industrious, with seven hundred acres of land showing his ability and success as an agriculturist, he is ever hospitable and generous. He well deserves the following written of him by Col. R. B. Caverly, in his "History of the Caverly Family:" "He has made himself a wealthy farmer. Full of commendable aspiration, always on duty, his town, as we trust, will be the better for his having lived in it. In-doors, at the hands of Elizabeth, you will always find industry, frugality, and the law of kindness. Our word for it, the neighbor, the friend, the poor, nor the weary-worn stranger will never find the 'latch-string' of that door pulled in."

Aaron W. Fols

N. C. TWOMBLY, M. D.

N. C. Twombly, M. D., son of Silas and Sally (Caverly) Twombly, was born near the academy in Strafford, Feb. 26, 1835. His ancestors for years have been connected with this section of the country. Ralph Twombly had land laid out Oct. 4, 1656, and was first taxed that year at Cochecho (Dover), N. H. His will, dated Feb. 28, 1684, was "proved" Aug. 7, 1686. His wife, Elizabeth, and son John were his executors. "If son John live with his mother, then they are to occupy the homestead jointly; if not, his wife is to have one-half. If Ralph live with his mother till he is twenty-one, then he is to have £10 in money, or goods equivalent. To son Joseph, a heifer; To daughter Mary (Tebbets), 5s.; To each of the children, Elizabeth, Hope, Sarah, Esther, and William, when eighteen years of age, a cow."—(Extract from will.) Thus we see he had eight children. Ralph had a son William and at least one other, Ralph. William settled in Madbury; had four sons,—Moses, Nathaniel, Joshua, John. Moses was born in Barrington, where his father had located, about 1735 or 1740. He married Elizabeth Holmes, sister to Ephraim Holmes, who married Sarah Wentworth, a descendant of Governor Benning Wentworth. Their children were Samuel, Anthony, William, James, Hannah, Deborah, Phebe. Samuel was born in 1766, married Olive Huntress, and was a farmer and basket-maker in Strafford. His children were Hannah (married James Roe), Silas, William (married Betsey Rollins, and settled in Gilmanton), Deborah (married Nicholas Evans, of Holderness), Samuel (a stone-mason, married Susan Durgin, settled in Newmarket, N. H., and has two grandchildren,—one, Belle Bryant, a remarkable organist, the other, Virginia, as noted an elocutionist), Enoch (married Lucretia Daniels), Moses (married a Parker, of Holderness, and settled in Maine), Daniel (born July 25, 1811, married Julia Reed, of New Bedford, Mass., and has two children,—Maria and Daniel W.), John (married Sarah Berry, and settled in Maine), Smith (died in Charleston, S. C.), Mesheck (lived and died in Lowell, Mass.), and Andrew J. (by a second marriage).

Silas Twombly, born in old Barrington (now Strafford), Dec. 22, 1798, was a farmer and cattle-dealer, owning about one hundred and fifty acres of land; was a hard-working, plain, quiet, old-fashioned man; in his younger days worked in a soap and candle factory in Massachusetts for several years, then returned to Strafford, and with industry and good deportment filled his not extensive sphere of life well; married Sally Caverly (a descendant of the Wentworths) March 18, 1822; had children,—John W. (born Dec. 22, 1822, now a prominent citizen of Mamaroneck, N. Y., and member of the Legislature of that State), Hazen (deceased), Harrison (born Sept. 25, 1826, married Harriet A. Caverly Nov. 29, 1855, and has one son, Charles H.), Silas H. (deceased; born Nov. 19, 1829, married Ann M. Twombly, had one child, Roxana,—Mrs. William Shepard), Sally A., Nehemiah Caverly, Viary S. (deceased).

Nehemiah C. Twombly passed his early years on his father's farm; attended common schools and what is now Austin Academy; was a diligent student, and when a young man acquired some reputation as a teacher by teaching three winter terms of school in Strafford and Barrington, he meanwhile working on the farm in summer. In 1861 he began the study of medicine with Dr. Charles Palmer, of Strafford, and while attending to other duties was for fifteen years a close medical student. Circumstances tending to open the way, he entered the University of Vermont, at Burlington, Vt., in 1875, and was graduated from thence June 24, 1876. After graduation he returned to his native town, and has already built up, by attention and skill, a promising practice. He married, Nov. 12, 1878, Elvira, daughter of Gilbert and Eliza (Durgin) Tasker, of Barnstead, N. H. (Gilbert Tasker was born Feb. 23, 1805, in the old town of Barrington; owned a large farm in Barnstead; was one of the responsible and wealthy agriculturists of that town; married Eliza, daughter of Jonathan and Susan (Bickford) Durgin, of Northwood. He died Sept. 23, 1876. Mrs. Tasker makes her home with her daughter.) Democratic in politics, Dr. Twombly was chosen to represent Strafford in the State Legislature of 1865. He is a justice of the peace and quorum, and has been for fifteen years; is largely engaged in probate business, and has been selected to administer on many estates. Of a strong vital and sanguine temperament, he has keen powers of analysis, and, with a large fund of language, is active and energetic in defense of everything he deems for the welfare of society or the improvement of mankind, and wields the pen of a ready writer. He has been for years a pronounced supporter of Christianity,—a Second Adventist in belief,—and from his outspoken nature there is never any difficulty in knowing where to find him, as there is nothing of the "time-server" in his composition.

DEACON EBENEZER SMITH.

Ebenezer Smith was born in Strafford, then Barrington, Sept. 29, 1810. He comes of two old families, Smith and Brown.

Garland Smith, born Jan. 8, 1744, of Somersworth, purchased land in Barrington, N. H., from John and Sarah Drew, Aug. 29, 1766. He was a farmer, married, Dec. 31, 1767, Mary, daughter of John Brown and his second wife (Nevens). They had ten children,—Patience, James, John, Ebenezer<sup>1</sup>, Lydia, Joseph, Garland, David, Mary, Hannah. He was of very social nature, successful in business, he accumulated a large property, and his homestead in Barrington is now occupied by his descendants. He was a man of great physical strength. At one time, while loading his boat with household supplies at Portsmouth, he stood in his boat, and, reaching up as high as he could reach, took down a barrel of molasses and placed it carefully in the bottom of the boat. He died June 25, 1814. Ebenezer Smith<sup>1</sup> was born on the homestead in Barrington, April 9, 1774. He was a farmer and a blacksmith, and married, Sept. 25, 1796, Patience, daughter of Nicholas Brown. Their children were Elizabeth, Daniel, Mary, Lydia, Sarah A., Hannah, Patience, Ebenezer<sup>2</sup>, William P. He purchased land at Strafford, Bow Lake (then Bow Pond), and in 1801 moved thither. Here his long and uneventful life was passed, and here he died July 10, 1856, aged eighty-three. His wife died March 8, 1854. He never sought office, was a man of few words, quiet and reserved, a valued citizen with strong love for family and home, and for many years and until his death a member of the Free-Will Baptist Church. (John Brown, born 1688, in Jersey, one of the Channel Islands of England, was abducted with his brother Daniel, two years older, and a servant lad named Duffy, about 1698, and brought to Portsmouth. Daniel died in Dover a few years thereafter. John passed a short time in Portsmouth and Dover, and lived the last few years of his minority in Madbury, N. H., as a servant for one Demeritt. He knew nothing of his parents for many years, but finally found them out, and had correspondence with them. They were quite wealthy, but the correspondence showing the relationship being accidentally destroyed after their death, there was not sufficient legal proof to secure the estate to the children of John. He married (1) a Drew, had one son, Josiah; (2) a Nevins, and by her had Joseph, Edward, John, Nicholas, Samuel, and Mary, who married Garland Smith. Nicholas, born Oct. 30, 1743, married Betsey Tibbetts, born Feb. 19, 1753. Their children were Reuben, Miriam, Patience (born Nov. 15, 1776), Judith, Nicholas, Mary, Daniel, Betsey, Nancy. An apple-tree set out by this Mrs. Brown in 1771, on the farm in Strafford now (1882) occupied by Azariah Foss, is to-day an immense and a vigorous tree.)

Deacon Ebenezer Smith had the country boy's educational advantages,—the common schools,—but was early learned to labor; learned the blacksmith's trade from his father, with whom he remained as long as he lived, and also became a farmer. He married Mary, daughter of John and Sarah (Clark) Smith, of Barrington. Her maternal grandfather was Remembrance Clark, of Madbury, N. H. She was born April 13, 1813. Their children were all born on the old homestead at Bow Lake. They are Sarah C. (Mrs. Daniel Otis), Olive A. (married Garland Brown, and has four children,—Sarah C., Zephyr H., Fred L., and Henry E.), Rufina (married Sauborn Parshley, and has five children,—Ethel B., Mary E., Henry G., Ina H., and Lula B.), Anna P. (Mrs. Paul P. Brown), May Ella (Mrs. Edrick I. Foss), Ebenezer Romanzo, Athelinda L.

In April, 1858, Deacon Smith moved to his present home, where he has since resided. He owns three hundred and fifty acres of land, a saw- and grist-mill, and is justly considered one of the best men of Strafford. Quiet and unostentatious, he is as inflexible as one of the old-time martyrs in following any course he deems marked out by duty. Originally a Whig, he was one of the first Abolitionists, and a Republican since 1856. Since early life he has been a member of the Free-Will Baptist Church. At the formation of the church at Bow Lake he was ordained deacon, and still holds that office in the church. His opposition to secret societies arises from a belief in their non-Christianity, and is earnest and marked, and no one who knows the man will doubt the sincerity of his purpose. He was anti-Masonic candidate for Governor of New Hampshire in 1880, and is now treasurer of the "New Hampshire Anti-Masonic Christian Association." Kind and charitable in his intercourse with his fellow-men, a loving father and husband, his home has been cheered by an amiable wife and dutiful children, and he is passing down to the twilight of life with a full conviction that it is but the gateway to a better land, and blest with the trusting confidence of the entire community.

ROBERT BOODEY CAVERLY, THE POET AND AUTHOR.<sup>1</sup>

A town becomes progressive and prosperous according to the force and valor of the great and good men who inhabit and inspire it. Even so, in a great measure, the achievements of an individual must depend on the quality and quantity of the blood and brain that move him.

Strafford has had numerous natives of much ability and merit, among whom our poet is prominent, and may well occupy a brief space in its annals. He comes down from a noble ancestry, and yet he inherited nothing save his sound health of blood, manly independence, and lofty aspirations. From early boyhood and from the common schools he plodded and paid his own way up to a thorough academic education.

Entering the militia, he was made the adjutant of a regiment, thence he was advanced to a brigade major, <sup>1</sup> By the Rev. Elias Nason, of Massachusetts.

and thence to a division inspector at the head of Maj.-Gen. Demeritt's staff, of which the late Hon. John P. Hale and Judge C. W. Woodman, of Dover, N. H., were aids. His final resignation obtained the following voluntary approval:

"The commander-in-chief accepts the resignation of Col. Robert B. Caverly, Inspector of the Second Division of the Militia of New Hampshire, but in doing this begs leave to express the high sense which he entertains of the active and efficient services rendered by Col. Caverly in the discharge of his military duties.

"By his excellency's command,
"JOSIAH LOWE, Adjutant-General."

In the mean time our poet had become principal of the high school at Great Falls, N. H., and with assistants held charge of some four hundred students. Thence he advanced to learn the law with the late distinguished John A. Burleigh, of that place, and thence to the Law College at Cambridge, Mass., where he graduated under the presidency of Josiah Quincy and the professorship of Judge Story and Simon Greenleaf, with the diploma of an LL.B. He commenced the practice of his profession at Limerick village, in Maine, and there serving as a trustee of its academy, he continued six years in his profession, engaging in important causes in its highest courts, many of which may be found published in the law reports of that State. Removing from Limerick to Lowell, Mass., he has continued in the law and in the writing and publication of books until the present time. At the breaking out of the Rebellion he visited New Hampshire at the call of its Governor, and lectured in many places for the purpose of raising soldiers for the war and the Union. Thence he visited Washington City, where he spent most of the four years of the conflict, and aided there, as far as he was able, the cause of the Union. During that time he was employed in law trials in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, in the High Court of Claims in the capital, and in the Supreme Court of the United States. But the most of our poet's time has been spent in Massachusetts. Her law reports for the last forty years afford ample evidence of the active and successful labors of this son of Strafford, yet sometimes he had been called to try causes in the courts of New Hampshire, one of which cases involved difficult questions wherein the laws of Massachusetts appeared to conflict with the statutes of New Hampshire. He was called into this case by an able lawyer who had previously been engaged in it. It was argued before the full bench in the State-house at Concord, and success followed his side of the case.

While at Washington, in the war time, business of the day usually ended at three o'clock, thereby allowing much spare time for outside work, and, moved by the war and its incidents, our author began to delineate them practically.

First, in 1862, he wrote his "Soldier's Mother" and the "Light of the World," published in the Washington Chronicle; next, then, his "Merrimac," then the "Love-Letter," then "The Bride of Burton," then "Arlington," then "Victory," and thence generally he proceeded to his many productions of epics, lyrics, and ballads.

In 1866, in the midst of his law profession, he published his "Merrimac," an epic of eighty pages.

In 1871 he wrote and published "Jewett's History of Barnstead."

In 1872-73 he published his second and third volumes of "Miscellaneous Poems."

In 1874 he led off in the building of the Duston Monument, on the Contoocook, and wrote for B. B. Russell & Co., of Boston, his "History of Hannah Duston," four hundred and four pages.

In 1875 he visited England and Scotland.

In 1876-77 he wrote his "Battle of the Bush," comprising five dramas, each preceded by an historic legend of some distinguished character as found in the New England Indian history.

Falling ill from overwork in 1878, he lost nearly a year's labor.

In 1879 he published the "Annals of the Caverly Family," two hundred pages.

In 1880 he wrote and published "Lessons of Love and Life," from John Eliot, together with his "Lineage of the Boodey Race," three hundred pages.

In 1881 he published at large his "Indian Wars of New England," including the exploits of Eliot the apostle, of Hannah Duston, and of the native Indian, five hundred pages.

His works, so far as they have been given to the public, have received unreserved commendation.

The Edinburgh Review (in Scotland), alluding to them, says, "Both Americans and English ought to thank Mr. Caverly for his laborious and interesting resume of those old Indian wars."

In 1866, Hon. H. W. Hazen, alluding to our poet's "Merrimac," through the Essex Banner, says, "The author of this poem is a distinguished lawyer in Lowell. He has brought into fresh notice times and men who should not be forgotten, and embalmed their deeds and memories in verse, which in this region may well be immortal." . . .

Hon. Judge J. Howard, late of the Supreme Court of Maine, in a long letter, says, "I have read these volumes (poems, Vols. I. and II.) with interest, and find them filled with effusions that seem to carry me back to other scenes and other times, and there is a freshness of the present mingling with the past in graceful measures, that seem to touch the life and experience of the many." . . .

Rev. Elias Nason, in a letter of 1872, discoursed of these volumes, saying, "I have perused the several pieces with keen and sympathetic pleasure, and I congratulate the author on the advanced record he made in beating the sweet fields of poetry. Aside from the intrinsic merit of his muse, the local scenes and circumstances which he poetizes become a part of our own life and being, and thus in reading him we have the joy not only of perusing tuneful narra-bers, but of seeing common things we know around us, as by an enchanter's wand, trans-figured into beauty. So the poet lives because he makes things live around him. Hence comes the dignity of the vocation."

Rev. Dr. Bouton, late historian of New Hampshire, in commendation of the same volumes, discourses of them as being "elegant in form and beautiful in sentiment and expression."

William Cullen Bryant, the poet, in his commendation of this author's war-poems, says, "What I most of all admire is the patriotic spirit which animates them."

Rev. Austin S. Garvin, in alluding to our author and his poems in a public journal of 1877, as heard at one of his lecture readings at Greenwood, Mass., says, "The entrancing interludes on the organ did not more surely carry the listener out into the pure, intoxicating enjoyment of nature than did the musical beat of the speaker's words, as in his first and longest piece he described the sights and sounds of primitive New England. As we listened, we thought it might not improperly be called a symphonic song, or poem of the creation, there was such comprehensive blending of varied melodies. We were taken back to the time when 'the morning stars sang together,' and then, by the gradually more measured tread of the language, the worlds were launched, and the mountains reared their crests up to the stars. In majestic diction the hills of New England were depicted. In the more flowing numbers that succeeded we were aware that the streamlets were born, and trickling, drew their silver line down the rocky slopes. Through the meadows meanders the peaceful river, gladdening herb, and bird, and man. The songs of the happy tenants of the air, and the sounds of many innocent and prosperous industries are heard from every side. Then, in more constrained, almost impatient rhythm, is given the vivid picture of nature in chains, but even the captive is beneficent. No longer the sportive, rambling runlet, but now the giant Merrimac in the hands of Philistines. The noise of a thousand wheels, the whirl of ten thousand spindles, and the clatter of looms are pictured in language fitly chosen to typify these active, gigantic, and incessant activities. And then, like peace after strife, comes the melodious description of the gorgeous fabrics, more wonderful than any fairy legend, and by the rich, subdued spirit of content that fills the verse, we feel, without being told, that a state of society in which all amenities, graces, and charities flourish is the purposed end of the magnificence and wealth of the creation."

Mr. Caverly has the honor of inaugurating and being the first president of the society known as "The Literati," in Middlesex County, Mass.

The mother of this poet had two brothers, the one, Robert Boodey, who, born in Madbury, went to New Durham, N. H., and finally settled in Limington, Me., and the other, Rev. Joseph Boodey, who settled in Strafford, north of Bow Lake, and died and was buried there in 1827. These clergymen were the very first two men who, with Benjamin Randall, were ordained as Free Baptists in that then new denomination of Christians. The first church of the denomination was organized in 1780, in the celebrated Boodey House, in New Durham, which these two brothers then occupied. Robert, in Maine, for some reason turned Quaker minister, and living long, Quakerized almost everybody who fell within the scope of his ministry.

Joseph, strong and eloquent, continued in Strafford as its first leading clergyman from 1780, upwards of forty years, to the date of his decease.

Those brothers and sister were children of Azariah Boodey, of Barrington, who was the only son of the New England ancestor, Zachariah Boodey, who, a French boy in 1695, at the age of eighteen years, landed in Boston from France, and with other boys there deserted the ship, took to the wilderness, and, evading the detectives, hid himself in a haymow in an old hovel, then in a corner of Cochecho, now Madbury, N. H., lived on milk from the cows, and crawling out after the ship's departure for France, settled down there at Cochecho, among the Indians (who would not harm a French boy), became a valiant pioneer, reared up a family, and from whom all the Boodeys in New England have descended.

A monument to the memory of this pioneer settler, with a large corn-mortar carved in it by the Indians, has recently been erected at his grave, under the supervision of our poet. It graphically marks the spot where the white man and red man in the long ago lived together in faithful, kindly fellowship. The monument is a granite boulder of many tons, inscribed in large letters and figures on its south side, "Boodey, 1695;" on its north, "King Philip, 1675;" on its east, "Demeritt, 1758;" and on its west side, "Caverly, 1880."

The Caverly ancestry extends back upwards of seven hundred years, first from our poet, born July, 19, 1806, to the father, John Caverly, lieutenant, who took his acres from lands thitherto possessed by the Indian tribes, and who, through labor, made himself a husbandman, well favored of fortune, and among men highly respected.

The old house which he built in 1777 still stands there on the old Province road, about a mile south of Bow Lake, in Strafford. It serves as a monument to the pioneer's early manhood, and a perpetual honor to his generous descendants, who to this day have carefully preserved it.

At the door of this old native cot our poet has thus soliloquized of the #### OLD HOME.

Dear, dear as ever, my native cot,
Framed of the father in the world;
My fond old mother marked the lot;
They took it from the tribes of old.

The giant growth of a thousand years,
 The sturdy oak, the chattering vine,
 Fell at the foot of pioneers
 That greeted them that olden time. . . .

Old cot, I gaze upon ye now,
 Off changing place to look thee o'er,
 I seem to see the floweret bow
 It boded blooming at thy door,
 Imparted love to high and low
 Those many, many years ago.

Ye tell me of paternal toil,
 That fenced the field in fervent care;
 Brought golden harvests from the soil,
 Through constant culture, generous, fair.

Thence from the father we follow back to Moses Caverly, of Barrington; thence from him to Moses, an emigrant from England, to Portsmouth, N. H., who, as appears, married Margaret Cotton there, Jan. 30, 1714, and who, with his sons, in 1746 became a part of the forty-two settlers of Barrington, where now, near the site of the late old French Mill, and within a mile of its old garrison-house (now gone), he, with several of his descendants, peacefully reposes. Thence we trace the blood farther back to Sir Henry Caverly, of England (1680), whom Hume says was a man of much distinction; thence to Edmund, an author, in London (1696); thence to Sir Anthony, whose arms bear date June 10, 1544; thence to Sir John Caverly, of 1403, a general officer of high distinction, as Hume has it, who fell in the battle of Shrewsbury, which Shakspeare elaborates; thence to Sir Hugh Caverly, of 1359, "the Chevilier virtue," who in the days of Edward III. and Richard II., having command of the armies of England, invaded France, took Calais, and as Governor of it, held it some twenty years. At that time he started off with forty thousand volunteers from the populace of England, made pitched battles, and thus achieved many victories (Hume's "History," vol. ii. p. 282). Thence we go back to our poet's remote ancestor, "John," of Scotland. He originated within the time when "surnames" were nearly unknown, and before it had become fashionable to endow the infant with a surname. In truth, "John" never had one.

In 1136, "John," then a boy, coming down from Scotland into Leeds, England, was there made a steward to the Empress Maud. At length a young lady (Gospatrik) and John fell in love, and soon after their intermarriage the Caverly manor, a vast inheritance of many hundreds of acres, situated about five miles west of Leeds, fell to her.

By this and by his own industry John became wealthy, built and endowed a church at Calverly, which ever since has, for seven hundred years, been kept in repair, and in which "John" still stands in statuary, with his three sons, John, Walter, and William, kneeling behind him.

At the birth of these sons "John" honored the name of his wife's inheritance by giving to the sons the surname "Calverly." And from "John and his boys who have descended all the Caverlys that have ever existed.

Thus, like the vapory wave of ocean, the generations of earth rise up, and making haste, chase each other down.

THE town of Rochester lies in the eastern part of the county, and is bounded as follows: on the north by Farmington and Milton, on the east by Salmon Falls River, which separates it from Maine, on the south by Somersworth, Dover, and Barrington, and on the west by Barrington, Strafford, and Farmington.

The surface of the town is rolling, and the soil generally fertile. It is watered by the Salmon Falls, Cocheo, and Isinglass Rivers.

Incorporation.—This town was incorporated by royal charter under date of May 10, 1722. The charter was granted in the name of King George I., and the signing of this document, which gave a "local habitation and a name" to this section, was the last act of government performed by Col. Samuel Shute, his Majesty's governor of the colonies of Massachusetts and New Hampshire. Its caption bears the following:

"George, by the Grace of God of Great Britain France and Ireland King Defender of the faith &c."

The town was named in honor of the Earl of Rochester, a brother-in-law of King James II., and one of the most eminent men of his time. For a number of years he had held the exalted position of lord treasurer.

Immediately following the charter is "A Schedule of the names of the Proprietors of the Town of Rochester with their respective proportions ascertained being Part of the Charter." First appears a list of fifty-two whole-share proprietors, heading which is the name of Col. Richard Waldron, and at the close "Parsonage," "Use of Grammar School," and "First ordained Gospel Minister." Secondly, "Half-share Proprietors;" of these there are eight. Then come twenty-four quarter-share proprietors, and, finally, "Associates admitted, Governor Shute for a home lot and five hundred acres; Lieut.-Governor Wentworth, ditto. Eight other members of the Government Council a whole share each."

The petition for the charter of the town was signed by most of the inhabitants of Dover, with others from Portsmouth, Newington, and Durham.

The first meeting of the proprietors was held at the meeting-house in Cocheo, July 9, 1722, "to consider, debate, and resolve such matters and things" as were necessary for the performance of the conditions of the charter. Col. Richard Waldron was chosen moderator, and Paul Gerrish town and proprietor's clerk.

The first condition of the charter required that within three years the proprietors should build a house and settle a family therein, and within four years plant or sow three acres of ground. The right of those who fail to comply was forfeited. It was therefore decided at this meeting that the most commodious part of the town should be laid out into "home lots," where the several proprietors might build their houses and settle their families. A committee was appointed to "pitch upon" the best location, and were also instructed to lay out roads and also a suitable "train-field." The clerk was instructed to procure a "book consisting of three quires of paper bound up in parchment, at the charge of the commoners," to keep the records in. This was all the business transacted. In consequence of the Indian troubles, which kept the border settlements in a constant state of alarm for the next few years, no meeting of the proprietors was held until April 24, 1727. At this meeting Paul Gerrish was re-elected clerk and served until his death, in 1744.

The first selectmen were also chosen at this meeting, as follows: Capt. Francis Matthews, Capt. John Knight, and Paul Gerrish. At this time but little interest seems to have been taken in the new plantation. The selectmen notified the committee which had been appointed five years before to lay out the home lots to reconsider a plan of division, and after five months a plan was submitted which proved not acceptable to the proprietors, and was voted "void and of no effect."

Capt. Robert Evans was then chosen by the proprietors to survey and lay out the plantation in one hundred and twenty-five lots, one lot for each share, of sixty acres each, in ranges from Salmon Falls River to the Barrington line.

The survey having been made, the drawing of the lots was commenced December 13th, at the meeting-house in Cocheo, by Rev. James Pike, and completed on the following day at Oyster River (Durham), whither the meeting had adjourned.

The territory now having been properly laid out, and the home lots satisfactorily drawn, the next move was the settlement of the town; and to Capt. Timothy Roberts it seems is due the honor of having been the first to settle within the bounds of the present town of Rochester. This was Dec. 26, 1728. He was not a proprietor, but purchased a quarter of a share of Samuel Twombly, of Dover, for ten pounds. He located below Gonic on a part of lot 90, first division. The deed of Twombly to Roberts was the first conveyance of land in the territory. Capt. Roberts was soon followed by other pioneers, prominent among whom were Eleazer Ham, Benjamin Frost, Benjamin Tebbets, and Joseph Richards. From this time forward the settlement rapidly increased in population, and soon became known throughout the State as one of the most important of the border settlements.

Although some of the settlers were of the Scotch-Irish immigrants, still the town was settled principally by people from Dover, where the greatest number of the proprietors lived. Of the first sixty families not one-fifth part were families of actual proprietors. To the original proprietors the lands were evidently more a matter of speculation and profit than of occupation and improvement. It is worthy of notice that the names now most common in town are those which frequently occur in the list of proprietors. Among these are Hayes, Wentworth, Hanson, Bickford, Edgerly, Whitehouse, Hurd, Horn, Foss, Ham, Evans, Roberts, Varney, and Tebbets.

April 20, 1730, it was decided to make another division of land, comprising a much larger tract than the first. Each share contained not less than two hundred and forty acres, and extended from the head of the first division to the region of the Three Ponds, including a large part of the present towns of Milton and Farmington. In the first and second ranges, third division, was a level tract, quite large in extent, to which was given the name of "Norway Plain," from the Norway pines with which it was covered. A large part of the plain was left common, and was the site of the present village of Rochester.

Dec. 17, 1730, the lots were drawn, and at the same meeting a town treasurer was chosen. Beside several votes in relation to the church and the minister, it was also voted that the ten-rod road running across the town by the meeting-house should be cleared "fit for man and horse to pass and repass." An overseer was appointed, with authority to hire men to carry on the work.

The proprietors held the entire control of affairs in the town until about the year 1740, when their political importance rapidly declined. They, however, kept up an organization until 1763, but their business was restricted to matters which concerned the property only. The last meeting of the proprietors was held at Stephen Wentworth's, in Rochester, June 28, 1784, when the town clerk was elected proprietor's clerk, and all books and papers of the proprietors were passed into his custody, and the office became vested in him and his successors forever.

The First Garrison-Houses—Indian War—The First Battle—John Richards—Jonathan Doer—Danger of abandonment of the Settlement—Petition for Soldiers—The Old Iron Cannon—Maj. Davis detests the Town—Attack by the Indians—The Killing of Mrs. Hodgdon—Peace—The British Press-Gang.

ALTHOUGH the settlement of Rochester had been long postponed on account of Indian wars, yet since it first actually commenced nothing of this kind had thus far occurred sufficient to interrupt its progress. The inhabitants must have numbered at this period (1744) nearly one hundred and fifty families, and being upon the very frontier, they were exposed most helplessly to all the horrors of the impending conflict. For a few weeks or months they might have neglected their work and lived in garrisons, or engaged in active operations against the enemy, yet, as the war continued, they were compelled to expose themselves in order to provide means of subsistence.

In 1774 the proprietors gave to the inhabitants all the mill-rents then due, to be appropriated for building five block-houses or forts, "three on the great road that leads to Norway Plains, one at Squamagogic upper mill, and one on the road by Newichwannoc River, or as his Excellency should otherwise order," and appointed a committee to carry out the vote. The forts were built, although the rents could not be collected to pay for them. Besides these public garrisons many were built at private expense, which received the names of their owners.

Garrisons were built two stories in height, the lower story being of solid timber, with strong window-shutters fastening upon the inside. The upper story projected three or four feet upon all sides, commanding approach to the building from every quarter. From the projecting part water could be poured down to extinguish the flames in case the house should be fired, while an enemy who came near the doors or windows was exposed to certain death. Loop-holes were provided at suitable places, large enough upon the outside for a gun-barrel to be pointed through them, and hollowed or beveled upon the inside to allow the gun to be moved about and aimed in different directions. The second story was built according to the fancy or ability of the owner. In the case of the Richard Wentworth garrison, it was made of thick planks dovetailed together at the corners like a chest, and without any frame, except a few braces. The cellars of the public garrisons were divided by walls into many separate apartments for accommodation of different families. This was the case with the one at the Gonic. As an additional protection oftentimes the whole building was surrounded with a rampart or palisade formed of timber or posts set in the ground.

A few anecdotes will illustrate the cunning of the Indians and the caution of the settlers. The cattle were discovered in the cornfield one day at Col. McDuffee's. The boys started at once to drive them out, when they were checked by the colonel, who said he knew the fence was strong, and the rascally Indians must have laid a plot to trap them. No one was allowed to move out of doors for a day or two, but when it was safe to venture forth the place of concealment which the Indians had contrived was discovered, and it was evident that they had cut down the fence, driven the cattle into the field, and placed themselves in ambush to kill or capture whoever came out.

At one of the garrisons a large number of hogs were kept, which were suffered to roam about during the day to feed upon acorns and such other food as they could find, and were called home at night. One evening they were called a long time, but none made their appearance. In the night, when it was quite dark, the hogs seemed to return suddenly, and a grunting as of a large drove was heard all around the building. The family were too wary, however, to be deceived by any such ruse as this; they suspected the truth, that the Indians had dispatched the hogs and were now imitating their grunts to entice somebody out of the garrison. That the imagination of the settlers often magnified the real danger or excited needless fears is very probable. Not much would be required to produce alarm after a few persons had fallen victims to these inhuman foes.

It was not until the 27th day of June, 1746, that any concerted attack was made by the Indians. What a thrill of horror ran through the community! By an artfully-contrived and boldly-executed plot, four men were murdered in the midst of the settlement, and within sight of a garrison; a fifth was wounded and taken prisoner. The names of these persons were Joseph Richards, John Richards, Joseph Heard, John Wentworth, and Gershom Down. They were on the way to their work in the field, carrying guns and traveling in company for mutual protection. A band of Indians had concealed themselves by the side of the road, near where these men must pass, having first sent one of their number to the opposite side, who stationed himself behind a tree at a convenient distance. Thus having prepared a snare, with all that cunning for which the race is noted, they patiently waited the approach of their victims. When the workmen arrived at the ambush, the solitary Indian, who was to act as a decoy and draw the fire of the party, stepped suddenly forth into full view and fired upon the company. "Face your enemies: fire!" was the order of Joseph Richards, who acted as captain, and all discharged their pieces at the savage, who, having effected his object, had instantly disappeared, escaping unharmed. The remaining Indians, with terrific yells and whoops, sprang from their ambush in the rear and rushed forward. John Richards was wounded. All the guns on both sides being discharged, an exciting race ensued. The whites fled down the road towards a deserted house belonging to the wounded Richards, where they hoped to gain refuge. The Indians followed as closely as they dared, but with caution, for fear the guns of some of their enemies might still remain loaded. The fleeing party—all except John Richards—succeeded in reaching and entering the house; the door was secured behind them, the men planting themselves firmly against it, while they hastened to reload their arms. Before they could accomplish this the Indians, finding themselves unable to force open the door, mounted to the roof, tore off the poles of which it was constructed, and falling upon the men, now defenseless, dispatched them in the most brutal manner. The guns of the murdered men were afterwards found half-loaded; and a web, which Mrs. Richards had left in the room unfinished, was stained with the blood of her neighbors. John Richards, who was wounded, instead of entering the house with the others, directed his flight to the garrison where his wife was dwelling; but before he could reach it an Indian overtook him, who, with uplifted tomahawk, was about to take his life. Richards called for quarter and was spared. His wound not being dangerous, and being able to travel, he was carried prisoner to Canada. This massacre occurred near the spot where a school-house now stands on the main road. The ambush was a short distance this side, near where Bedfield Meserve resides.

Taking the wounded Richards with them, the Indians, to escape pursuit, struck hastily into the swamp, killing some cattle on the route, and cutting out their tongues and a few tidbits, and next made their appearance on the Salmon Falls road near Adams' Corner. They surprised some men at work in a field, all of whom, however, made their escape. Jonathan Door, a little boy, who in youthful innocence sat whistling upon a fence, became a fellow-captive with Richards. Under the skillful medical treatment of the Indians the wound of Richards was soon healed; and after remaining a year and a half in Canada, he was sent by flag of truce to Boston, and thence returned to his friends in Rochester. He bought the place in the village now owned by J. H. Ela, Esq., and here he lived after his return. He died in 1792, aged seventy. His son, of the same name, inherited the place, and for years was a miller in the Horne & Burd mill, situated opposite, where Deacon Barker's grist-mill now stands. He was a Revolutionary soldier, and served through the war; was in the battle of Bunker Hill and at the surrender of Ticonderoga, where he narrowly escaped capture; he was at the battle of Bennington and at the surrender of Burgoyne. He is remembered by many now living.

The excitement produced by the atrocity of the 27th of June cannot easily be imagined. The suddenness of the attack, its locality,—the most thickly-settled part of the town,—the exciting nature of the struggle, the death of so many of their friends and neighbors, and the escape of the enemy before pursuit could be made,—all must have roused to an intense degree the feelings of the people. It is apparent from the haste with which they adopted measures for future security that great anxiety prevailed. No sooner were the remains of the murdered men buried than a petition to the Governor and Assembly at Portsmouth was dispatched, representing the dangerous situation of the inhabitants, and begging for a guard of soldiers to protect them. This petition "humbly sheweth that the inhabitants are few in number, in indigent circumstances, living in a wilderness, and are continually liable to the assaults of the barbarous Indian enemy, who have killed within the past week four men, and taken prisoners one man and a boy. They have killed and wounded a considerable number of our cattle; they are continually lurking about our houses and fields, and are seen by some of us almost every day; we cannot go out or come in without being liable to fall by them, and our families are suffering because we are not able to go out to labor." Such is the enumeration of their distresses. "Therefore we pray your Excellency and your Honors to take our deplorable circumstances under your wise consideration, and extend to us your paternal care and affection by allowing us a suitable number of soldiers to guard us in our garrisons and about our necessary employments."

The excitement had not subsided when another event occurred which carried it to still greater height, and added another life lost to the list of their calamities.

Traces of Indians had been discovered in the sand by the heath brook at Norway Plain, and in expectation that a party were on their way to attack the settlements a company of men concealed themselves at night by the side of the road a short distance below Norway Plain Brook, at the foot of Heavens' Hill, intending in their turn to ambush the Indians when they came along. Upon the approach of the enemy, however, one of these sentinels, Moses Roberts, became alarmed and commenced to creep through the bushes towards his neighbor, who, seeing the bushes wave and supposing him to be an Indian, fired upon him. Roberts died the next morning, blaming himself, and justifying the man who shot him.

To support the petition of the inhabitants and prevent that the settlement would be broken up unless they received assistance, Rev. Mr. Main was sent to Portsmouth. His mission was successful; for, besides the assurance of soldiers to protect them, he returned with a very substantial token of the "paternal care and affection" of the authorities in the form of a huge cannon, one of the iron guns of Queen Anne's time, for the safe return of which, when demanded, he gave his receipt in a large sum. The history of this cannon is worthy of a brief digression. It was intended for an alarm-gun, by use of which the people of the town might be summoned together whenever danger was apprehended. During the Indian war it was kept at Mr. Main's. Afterwards it was moved to Stephen Wentworth's tavern, a house which is still standing, situated upon the lot owned by Dr. Farrington. This house was called the Wolfe tavern, from the immortal Gen. Wolfe, who had then recently given up his life upon the Plains of Abraham. The Wolfe tavern was a place of no mean renown; it was the only public-house in town; it was also the only store in town, for not only were there accommodations here for weary travelers, but the necessary articles of life, such as rum and crockery-ware, were dispensed to seeking customers. But the grand boast of the Wolfe tavern was in something more aristocratic than these. It was here that His Excellency Governor Wentworth always "put up" when journeying to and from his farm in Wolfborough, a distinguished honor to any tavern. Here the old gun for a long time found a home, a hospitable roof we presume, where its powers of speaking loudly were not over-tested by warlike youth. From this place it would be impossible to trace its wanderings. It appears during its whole career to have experienced more than the usual vicissitudes of earth,—from the minister's to the tavern, from scaring away "the barbarous Indian enemy" to celebrating with booming voice many anniversaries of national independence,—yet ever faithful through good report and through evil report, until, like many a brave soldier, its existence was thrown away in a noble cause by the folly and recklessness of its commander. It was exploded July 4, 1845, by William J. Roberts, William Hodgdon, and some others, and its fragments found an inglorious burial among metal of baser and more ignoble rank in the iron heaps of the foundry. There were many mourners. The town discovered that they had lost a time-honored friend. Its loss was even so much regretted that at the next town-meeting the selectmen were instructed to prosecute the individuals who had sold the old iron. A long and expensive lawsuit grew out of this prosecution, in which the town was defeated, not being able to establish its ownership, a result well deserved by the town perhaps for its neglect to care for its property.

Crowned with success in the object of his visit, Mr. Main returned to the settlement. Throughout the summer and autumn and a part of the winter scouting parties of soldiers were stationed in the town, whose duty it was to go their daily rounds upon the most traveled roads near the garrisons, and from garrison to garrison, occasionally making longer marches when special reasons required. These parties or squads usually consisted of from twelve to twenty men, who were relieved every few weeks by fresh soldiers. When long marches across country were to be made the number was of course much larger. Upon report that a party of thirty Indians had killed a man at Penacook (Concord), and were approaching Rochester, Governor B. Wentworth ordered Maj. Davis, with a detachment of forty men, to march to Rochester to scout about that town. Similar cases frequently occurred. It was doubtless owing to such prudent precautions and the continual presence of soldiers that there was no further loss of life this year. In the spring of 1747 the inhabitants found it necessary to petition for a guard, and as a strong argument why their favor ought to be extended to them, they set forth that no less than twenty of their brethren were enlisted in His Majesty's service for the Canada expedition. Several families had already moved from the town, driven by distress and fear of the enemy. The petitioners confessed themselves unable to defend the settlement. Their only dependence for succor and relief was upon the Provincial authorities, and while they acknowledged the protection granted to them during the past year, and returned for it their hearty thanks, yet unless the same be continued to them they must unavoidably move away, and leave all their improvements for the Indians to destroy. Maj. Davis with thirty men was sent to their protection. Uncommon danger must have threatened the settlement at this time, for at a public town-meeting in the October following the town voted their grateful acknowledgment to the Governor and Council for sending Maj. Thomas Davis with thirty soldiers, "who by his prudent, diligent, and careful management, under Divine Providence," had been instrumental in defeating the enemy in their attempts against them, and so of preserving their lives. Perhaps there had been an engagement, for on May 23, 1747, Samuel Drown, a soldier, had been wounded; he was for a long time taken care of at the expense of the province. Upon the 7th of June of this year an attempt was made by the Indians to capture or kill a party of men at work in a field. Every one who has traveled the Neck road remembers the spring by the road-side about half a mile below Gonic. It was near this spring that the Indians lay in ambush. They were discovered by three boys, John and George Place and Paul Jenness. The Indians fired upon them. John Place returned the fire and wounded an Indian. Jenness presented his gun in a threatening manner, but did not fire. By keeping it aimed towards the Indians he prevented them from rushing upon them until the men in the field, who had heard the firing, came to their relief, and the Indians were put to flight. The wounded Indian was traced by the stains of blood for a long distance.

A few rods from the road leading from Rochester village to Gonic, and not far distant from the latter place, in a quiet spot half encircled by trees which line the high river-bank, several rough, unlettered stones, indistinctly visible to the passing traveler, mark the resting-place of some of the early inhabitants. One of these graves is that of Jonathan Hodgdon's wife, who was killed by the Indians May 1, 1748. The particular locality of her death is just beyond the "Great Brook," upon the right-hand side of the road, nearly opposite the place of her burial. She had gone out to find and milk her cows. It was a still Sabbath morning. For several days a considerable party of Indians, lying concealed upon Ham's Hill, which commanded a view of Squamagonic garrison, had watched all the movements of the settlers. They contemplated something more than the capture or murder of one solitary woman. Tradition says it was their plan to watch the fort until they saw the men depart with their guns to church, surprise and capture the women and children left behind, and finally waylay the men themselves upon the road,—a favorite stratagem of these tribes; but seeing Hodgdon and his wife leave the fort together, they determined to attack them. Mrs. Hodgdon was seized, and the Indians would have kept her quiet and carried her away a prisoner, but as she persisted in screaming they killed her on the spot. Her husband, who was at a short distance, heard her cries and hastened to her rescue, not knowing the cause of her fright, but intending, if the Indians had taken her, to surrender himself also. He arrived at the instant of her death, while the savages were in the act of scalping her. He presented his gun, but it missed fire. He then made his escape to the garrison. The news spread rapidly. The old iron cannon upon the hill, charged with nine pounds of powder it is said, thundered its note of alarm to distant inhabitants. It was heard even at Portsmouth. Several hundred people gathered together. A company of light-horse from Portsmouth arrived at two o'clock in the afternoon, and the country was scoured as far as Winnipiseogee, but without success. The Indians, it was believed, concealed themselves upon islands in the river near our village.

This was the last attempt of the Indians in Rochester. Such vigor of pursuit perhaps deterred them from any subsequent attack. Peace took place the following year, a peace of short duration, for in 1754 the sword was resumed. Heretofore the English had carried on the war in a desultory and feeble manner, which encouraged their enemies to undertake these marauding and murdering excursions. After this period the English displayed more vigor: they fitted out formidable expeditions against Canada, and largely relieved the Eastern settlements from the calamities of war. One of these expeditions was against Louisburg, a strong city of Cape Breton,—the "Dunkirk of America," as it was called. It was captured by the British in 1758. Following are the names of some of the soldiers from this town engaged in His Majesty's service at this time: Lieut. John McDuffie, Ensign William Allen, John Copp, Jr., Daniel Alley, Ichabod Corson, Gershom Downs, Eleazer Rand, William Berry, Jabez Dame.

The British officers sent press-gangs into the towns during the war to impress men into their service. The people of Rochester petitioned to be exempted from the press; but it does not appear that the petition was granted. When the press-gang visited the town, Jabez Dame, whose name is given in the above list, concealed himself until the danger was past; the next morning, however, having informed the girl he was courting of his intentions, he volunteered. The war was virtually closed in 1759 by the surrender of Quebec. The following year all the remaining French possessions in Western Canada were surrendered to the English, and the Eastern settlements found a permanent peace from the ravages of the Indians.

CHAPTER CIX.

ROCHESTER.—(Continued.)

WAR OF THE REVOLUTION.

The Activity of Rochester.—Town Committee of Correspondence.—Nicholas Austin.—First Enlistments.—List of Minute-men and Volunteers.—List of Continental Soldiers.—Prominent Men of the Revolution.

ROCHESTER may well be proud of her Revolutionary record. Her delegates were present at all the conventions called to co-operate with the other American colonies, and she paid her proportion of the expenses of each Continental Congress. She cheerfully took her part of the responsibility of resisting British authority, and her citizens shared largely in the feeling which animated the American people. They responded with alacrity to every call for soldiers, they gave them liberal bounties, and provided for the support of their families. Their minute-men marched immediately when notified, and at one time, when other troops withdrew from the field, Rochester responded to the urgent call of Washington for reinforcements, and sent a company of militia to his army at Cambridge. Her soldiers took part in the capture of Burgoyne at Saratoga, and of Cornwallis at Yorktown. They were in the battle of Trenton, and went through the sufferings of Valley Forge. Twenty-nine men were lost during the war.

As early as Feb. 4, 1774, a committee of correspondence was appointed, consisting of Hon. John Plumer, John McDuffie, Ebenezer Tibbitts, and Daniel Wingate, and it was voted that a copy of the resolves passed at this meeting "be sent to the Committee of Correspondence at Portsmouth, assuring them that our Hearts are knit with theirs in the noble Cause of Freedom." John Plumer was moderator of this meeting, and Josiah Main town clerk.

In the fall of 1774, when Gen. Gage, who commanded the British army in Boston, wanted carpenters to build barracks for the troops, and could not hire them in Massachusetts, he applied to Governor Wentworth, of New Hampshire. The Governor dispatched agents to the back towns in the hope to secure workmen, but New Hampshire was no more servile than Massachusetts. One of these agents, Nicholas Austin, visited Rochester, but the loyal men were on the alert. He was compelled to make a humble acknowledgment on his knees before the committee, and "this prudent step disarmed the popular rage, and prevented any injury to his person or property."

Immediately after the battle of Lexington a recruiting office was opened in Rochester, at Stephen Wentworth's tavern, and men were rapidly enlisted. At a Provincial Congress held soon after at Exeter, James Knowles and John McDuffee were sent as delegates.

Among the first to offer his services was John McDuffee, who was commissioned, May 20, 1775, as lieutenant-colonel of the Third Regiment (Col. Poor's). Hon. John Plumer, Lieut.-Col. John McDuffee, Deacon James Knowles, and Dr. James Howe were prominent citizens of the town during the Revolutionary period.

Hon. John Plumer was the first magistrate in the town. He was appointed by the British Governor a judge of the Court of Common Pleas when that court was organized in 1773. He was reappointed in 1776, when an independent State government was first established. He retained the office till his voluntary resignation in 1795, at which time he was chief justice.

Lieut.-Col. John McDuffee was born in 1724; was a lieutenant in the French and English wars; was at the capture of Louisburg in 1758, and commanded a detachment of men under Gen. Wolfe at the siege of Quebec. He served in the Revolutionary army from the battle of Bunker Hill till 1778, being part of the time brigade commissary. He was the first representative of the town, being chosen to the Provincial Assembly in 1762; also a member of the State Legislature in 1782. Was six years a State senator, being part of that time "senior senator," or chairman. Died Oct. 15, 1817, aged ninety years.

Deacon James Knowles came to Rochester in 1749. Held many town offices; was a member of many of the conventions that fostered the spirit of the Revolution; was six years a member of the Legislature. For forty years he was a deacon of the church. He was universally trusted and respected, and spent a large portion of his long life in useful and unambitious public service.

Dr. James Howe was one of six brothers who served their country in the Revolution from the battle of Bunker Hill till the close of the war. Dr. Howe was surgeon's mate in Col. Long's regiment, and was one of the sufferers in the Canada expedition in 1777. He was three years a representative in the Legislature, and was distinguished for his natural talent and his great benevolence.

First Congregational Church.—The town of Rochester was incorporated and a charter granted in 1722. One of the conditions of the charter was that the proprietors build a meeting-house within four years. Indian wars prevented any settlement in the town for six years, and the condition was not fulfilled. In 1730 it was voted to build a meeting-house, forty feet long, thirty feet wide, and eighteen feet stud, to be well framed and inclosed. The house was built in 1731, on Havens' Hill.

In 1776, this house having become dilapidated and in danger of being blown down by the wind, it was proposed that a new one be built; but, on account of the war, it was delayed until 1780; then a new church was built upon "The Common." This house remained unpainted, and for years had neither steeple or bell. It had galleries on three sides. Many of pews were high square boxes. The middle of the house was provided with free benches.

In 1842 this house was moved from "The Common" to the corner of Main and Liberty Streets. It was then renovated, and a vestry was added below. In 1868 it was enlarged and remodeled at an expense of eight thousand five hundred dollars. In 1876 repairs were again made on the interior of the house, and it is now a pleasant and commodious house of worship.

The following is a list of the pastors from 1737 to 1883:

The First Free-Will Baptist Society was organized March 19, 1825, at the house of Enoch Tibbetts. A church was organized at the house of John York, April 15, 1829, when seventeen persons received the right hand of fellowship. Conference meetings were held monthly at private dwellings for several years. From 1833 to 1838 no records are found. In the latter year the church reorganized and was divided into several branches, each branch to have the privilege of holding monthly meetings. In 1840 a meeting-house was built and dedicated at Gonio. The first quarterly meeting in Rochester was held at the court-house in 1839, August 10th. In 1842, Rev. D. Swett was chosen first pastor of the church. In 1864 a powerful revival attended the labors of Rev. W. T. Smith. The society in 1873-74 made extensive repairs on their meeting-house, expending nearly three thousand dollars, making it a very neat and attractive church edifice. Rev. W. S. Packard is their present pastor.

Friends.—The first record we find is from the Monthly Meeting in Dover,—“23d 9th mo., 1751. The Friends at Rochester have liberty to keep a meeting there till the last of the 1st month next.” This permission was renewed from time to time for short periods only, usually about a month. In 1777 the same liberty was granted during the pleasure of the Monthly Meeting. In 1776 there were twenty-two adult male Friends who declined to join the Test Association. In 1781 the advice of the Monthly Meeting was given to the Friends of Rochester, on their asking for it, to build a meeting-house. The house was built on the Dover road, near Judge Dame's. It was afterwards taken down and the material used for a new house near Gonio, from which place it has since been removed to its present location. The Monthly Meetings were held in Rochester as early as 1820, and perhaps earlier. A meeting-house was built at Meaderborough some time previous to 1805. In 1823 there were reported to be twenty families belonging to one meeting and fifteen families to the other. In 1838 a collection of books for a library was commenced.

The Second Free-Will Baptist Society was organized in 1846 with about sixty persons, and a constitution adopted.

The East Rochester and South Lebanon Free-Will Society was organized June 1, 1865, and Rev. Isaac Hyatt became pastor. The church edifice was built soon after at a cost of six thousand dollars. Rev. R. McDonald is its present pastor.

The Walnut Grove Free-Will Baptist Society have a neat meeting-house on the Salmon Falls road, erected in 1867. They have continued their meetings and Sabbath-school and sustain preaching most of the time, Rev. E. True being their present pastor.

The Rochester Village Free-Will Baptist Church was organized in October, 1871, consisting of sixteen members. Rev. Ezekiel True was chosen its first pastor. They have sustained preaching to the present time. The present number of church-members is eighty-three; the Sabbath-school numbers one hundred and ninety-three. They have no meeting-house, but have purchased a lot and contemplate building a church edifice as soon as they can do so without incurring a debt. Rev. E. P. Moulton is their present pastor.

The first session of the New Hampshire Yearly Meeting of Free-Will Baptists ever held in this town was convened with this church in June, 1882, which was very fully attended and interesting, the Congregationalists kindly giving the use of their church for the occasion.

The Adventists hold service in the town; also the Catholics. The latter have a house of worship. Rev. Louis M. Wilde is the present pastor.

The First Universalist Church in Rochester was organized March 27, 1841, with the following members: Benjamin Hayes, Edward Tibbetts, Paul Libbey, William Jackson, Silas Wentworth, Jonathan J. Henderson, Jacob J. Garland, James M. Garland, Joel Varney, Lemuel B. Ham, and James H. Place. The congregation worships in McDuffee Hall.

The first minister was Rev. R. O. Williams, in 1841. His successors have been as follows: Eben Francis, 1842; George G. Strickland in 1843 and 1845; William Cilley and E. Coffin in 1844; E. H. Lake in 1847-48; Thomas J. Greenwood in 1850, 1855, and 1856; A. A. Miner in 1850; Rev. Mr. Pettee in 1852; Rev. Mr. Hicks in 1859; and in 1862, Revs. Mr. Eaton and Patterson.

From the organization to 1865 the society had to be content with occasional preaching, only one of the above-named preaching at all regular, viz., Rev. E. H. Lake, who supplied with preaching every other Sabbath during the summers of 1847 and 1848.

After the year 1865, owing to deaths and removals of those who had been instrumental in keeping the society alive, it ceased to hold meetings until August, 1877, when a reorganization was effected, and by the aid at first of the New Hampshire Convention it began to hold services monthly, meetings being supplied by the Convention with preachers, among whom were the Revs. E. L. Conger, James Gorton, Mr. Ralph, of Columbus, Ohio; Mr. Powers, of Vermont; G. L. Demarest and L. F. McKinney, of Manchester; E. M. Grant, W. S. Vail, Benton Smith, George W. Quinby, Dr. Sawyer, of Boston; Mr. Spalding, of Peabody; W. S. Perkins and H. W. Smith, of Tuft's College. In 1879 and 1880 services were held each Sabbath, and in September, 1880, a call was given to Rev. H. W. Smith to settle with us permanently. The call was accepted, and he began his labors Oct. 1, 1880, and is the present pastor. The church holds worship in McDuffee Hall.

Methodist Episcopal Church.—Rev. Warren Ban-

ister and Rev. Ebenezer Blake were the first Methodist ministers who preached in Rochester. The first sermon was preached in a school-house in 1807, on what is now called the main road. There were at first preaching services once in four weeks on week evenings. There being no visible fruit following the labors of the two above-mentioned ministers, they determined, after one more trial, to abandon Rochester for some more promising field. In the mean time, however, three persons professed religion, and the meetings were continued. The first class-meeting was organized about sunrise at the residence of Paul Place. In 1808, Rev. L. Bates and Rev. E. F. Newell were appointed preachers in charge of the Tuftonborough Circuit, and continued to hold meetings in this town. The first Quarterly Conference held in Rochester met at the house of Paul Place. This year C. Dame opened his house on the Plains for preaching. The growth of the society was such that in the course of the year it became necessary to organize a second class-meeting. Rev. H. Field and Rev. A. Taylor were stationed on the Tuftonborough circuit in 1809. Mr. Field devoted most of his time to this section. During Mr. Field's ministry the court-house was opened for preaching, and very large congregations attended the services. In 1810 Rochester became a separate appointment under the name of "Norway Plains," and Rev. H. Field was returned as the pastor. About this time a little opposition was organized to the Methodists. A great crowd came together for the purpose of mobbing the preacher. Mr. Field selected Thomas Wentworth and David McDaniels as guards, and went as usual to meet his appointment. His enemies, seeing that he was not to be intimidated by threats, failed to carry their design into execution. Rev. L. Frost was the preacher in charge in 1811. At the close of his pastorate we have the first record of membership now to be found. The church at this time consisted of ninety-one members. Rev. A. Clark was appointed pastor in 1812. No marked religious interest was manifest this year; the membership, however, increased to one hundred and eight. About this time we find a commencement made in the matter of financial records. In 1813, Rev. J. Samborn was appointed pastor. He was a young man of marked ability. His labors were crowned with success. Rev. H. Morey was the preacher in charge in 1814.

In 1815, Rev. N. Bigelow was appointed as pastor.

Rev. John Lord was the pastor in 1816. Mr. Lord commenced his labors under very discouraging circumstances. He was, however, a strong man, and overcame difficulties to such an extent that it was supposed this was the most prosperous year in the history of the society up to this time. There were, it has been supposed, about one hundred conversions, with an accession to the church of about sixty. During the years 1817 and 1818, Rev. P. Munger acted as pastor. Brother Munger was a physician, and tried the practice of medicine in connection with his work as pastor. Of his success in either direction but little is known, although he is spoken of as a strong preacher. Rev. John F. Adams was preacher in charge during 1819 and 1820. He labored faithfully and successfully. In 1820 he was given Rev. S. Norris as an assistant. In the course of the year Mr. Norris was removed to another field of labor. This was the occasion of some dissatisfaction on the part of the people. The year, however, closed satisfactorily to the preacher in charge and profitably to the people. Rev. D. Young was appointed to the charge in 1821. During the year he had a very severe sickness. He attributed the fact that he did not die to the prayers of the people. Notwithstanding his affliction the year was a very prosperous one, showing a large increase in membership. In 1822, Mr. Young was reappointed, with Rev. Mr. Gardner as colleague. Brother Young's health continued poor, yet he labored so faithfully that at the close of the second year he left the church in a very prosperous state. Of Brother Gardner nothing is said in the records. It is supposed he labored on some other part of the circuit.

Rev. J. Horton and Rev. William McCoy were the preachers in charge in 1823. They occupied the pulpit alternately to the entire satisfaction of the people. Rev. B. Jones was appointed pastor in 1824. Up to this time the people worshipped in the court-house. This year a subscription was secured for the purpose of building a church. Rev. H. Foster was pastor in 1825. The enterprise of building a church, started the preceding year, this year was carried to completion. The house was dedicated in October by Rev. E. F. Newell. The size of the church was forty-two by fifty-five feet. The cost of the house was only one thousand nine hundred and twenty-three dollars. Rev. Charles Baker was the minister in 1826. Mr. Baker was an able man. His preaching attracted large congregations. An act of incorporation was granted this year by the Legislature of New Hampshire to the trustees of the society, and to their successors in office forever. In 1827 Rev. J. E. Risley was appointed to the church. He was a moderate preacher, but an excellent pastor. Mr. Risley was received with some coldness, yet the year closed better than any expected. Mr. Risley was returned the next year and received very warmly by the people. The second was a very prosperous year. Over fifty were added to the church. This year a parsonage, eighteen by thirty-eight feet, was built, costing less than four hundred dollars. Brother Risley, it is said, left Rochester improved more than fifty per cent. Rev. Samuel Norris was the stationed minister in 1829 and 1830. Brother Norris was a very faithful pastor. In 1830 we have the first record of a Sunday-school connected with the church. It appears, however, that prior to this time there had been a Sunday-school held in a school-house, in which the people generally united. It is to be regretted that the files of the Sunday-school reports for years are lost. In 1831, Rev. B. C. Eastman was pastor. He was a very energetic preacher. Under him the church improved greatly in spirituality. It is thought that Mr. Eastman had a greater influence over the people than any minister who preceded him. He was returned in 1832. In 1833, Rev. L. Bennett was pastor. This year commenced under the most favorable circumstances, there being a religious work of unusual interest in progress, notwithstanding that the year closed most unpleasantly for pastor and people. Rev. J. C. Smith, in 1834, followed Mr. Bennett. He commenced his work under very discouraging circumstances. He was, however, warmly received, and well sustained by the people. This year we have the first account of raising money for missions. Brother Smith was reappointed in 1835. Of this year many excellent things might be said. In 1836 Rev. S. Green was appointed as pastor, and returned in 1837. Mr. Green was a good man, and met with great prosperity. Many of the best people of the church were led to the Saviour through his influence. Rev. A. H. Worthing was appointed to the pastorate of the church in 1838 and 1839. Mr. Worthing suffered from poor health, which was the occasion of great trial to himself and embarrassment to his work. He labored faithfully, however, and at the close of his pastorate stood high in the estimation of his people. In 1840, Rev. E. Mason was appointed pastor, and returned in 1841. Mr. Mason labored with great earnestness in the temperance cause, holding meetings in all the school-houses in town. In 1840, a vestry was built and the church repaired at an expense of about four hundred dollars. Mr. Mason was much beloved by his people. Rev. William D. Cass was pastor during 1842 and 1843. Mr. Cass was an able preacher. In 1843 the Millerite excitement was very intense in Rochester. But for the labors of Mr. Cass the church would have been rent to pieces. He was faithful and fearless in exposing the extravagance which threatened the destruction of the church. Rev. O. C. Baker was appointed preacher in charge, 1844. He was received very warmly by the people. Very much to the regret of the congregation he was removed at the close of the first year because of a misunderstanding between the presiding elder and the church. Rev. Henry Drew was the appointed pastor in 1845 and 1846. The beginning of this pastorate was not as pleasant as might be, owing to the state of feeling consequent upon the removal of Mr. Baker. After an interchange of views the people saw that whoever might have been to blame Mr. Drew was not, and so concluded to sustain him and work with him. The church was remodeled, the gallery altered, and four new pews added at an expense of seven hundred dollars.

Rev. Samuel S. Matthews was the pastor in 1847.

He was greatly embarrassed in his work by sickness in his family, but struggled manfully until his own health failed. He died September 6th, aged thirty-two years. He was a devoted, faithful minister. He passed away expressing feelings of gratitude that he had ever been a Methodist preacher. His successor in 1848 was Rev. D. M. Rogers. There were arrangements made by which Mr. Rogers supplied a part of the time at Milton Mills. This division of labor was an embarrassment to the work in Rochester, and it was thought no advantage to the cause in Milton Mills. Rev. S. Green was returned for a second pastorate in 1849. When Mr. Green was here before, he left such an excellent record that now he was received by the people most heartily. The church this year was prospered. Rev. Jos. C. Cromack was appointed the pastor in 1850, and reappointed in 1851. Mr. Cromack gave especial attention to the financial interests of the church, with very encouraging results. Religiously, too, the society was prospered under his supervision. Rev. H. H. Hartwell was preacher in charge during the years 1852 and 1853. The first year Mr. Hartwell had eight preaching places. Two of them were supplied the second year by a local preacher. In 1853 the church was enlarged, the vestry improved, and an organ purchased. Entire amount of money required, a little over two thousand two hundred dollars. In addition to his other work, Mr. Hartwell worked up subscriptions to meet the expenses thus incurred. In the spring of 1854 the New Hampshire Annual Conference was held in Rochester. Rev. S. Holman was appointed pastor by this session of the Conference. He had a successful year. The people this year contributed one thousand dollars to the Conference Seminary. During 1855 and 1856, Rev. Henry Hill was preacher in charge. The second year of Mr. Hill's pastorate was one of incessant toil. Many of his people were sick and died. He also secured a subscription of five hundred dollars, which freed the church from debt. Rev. George S. Dearborn was preacher in charge in 1857-58. The two years of his pastorate were very successful. Mr. Dearborn was regarded as a man of good ability. Rev. William Hewes was the appointed pastor in 1859-60. During his pastorate the congregations were unusually large. Mr. Hewes was a preacher of marked ability. Rev. John L. Trefren was pastor during 1861-62. Under his influence there was a remarkable religious awakening. Before the close of the year about a hundred people made a profession of religion. In 1861 the present parsonage was built at a cost of three thousand dollars. In 1862 an effort was made to secure the enlargement of the church, but without success. In 1863 and 1864, Rev. C. Holman was the pastor. Mr. Holman was a very acceptable pastor, and did a good work. Rev. E. R. Wilkins served the church as its minister during 1865 and 1866. During his pastorate the question of building a new church was agitated.

Mr. Wilkins was a genial man, an excellent pastor, always ready to render every possible assistance in sickness. Rev. F. K. Stratton was pastor in 1867. The corner-stone of the new church was laid the first day of August, in presence of five thousand people. The ceremony was participated in by the Masonic fraternity. Among other remarkable documents deposited in the corner-stone worthy of mention was a letter from Lafayette expressing regrets at not being able to be present at the laying of the corner-stone of the old church, in 1825. The new church was dedicated in April, 1868. The sermon was preached by Rev. J. M. Chapman. The house is built of brick. Vestry and class-rooms first-story, with audience-room above. The dimensions of the church is sixty by ninety feet. The cost was over twenty thousand dollars. Rev. L. P. Cushman was appointed pastor in 1868, and served the church in this capacity three years. Mr. Cushman was a hard worker. As a pastor he was a success. He left the church much better than he found it. Rev. D. J. Smith was the pastor from 1871 to 1873. Brother Smith was one of the most thoughtful preachers who has ever been pastor of this church. He was very considerate of the poor and afflicted. His pastorate here was a success. The people thought more of him the better they became acquainted with him. From 1874 to 1876, Rev. S. G. Kellogg was preacher in charge. Mr. Kellogg was a man of extended experience. He had been a presiding elder. He was an instructive preacher. Owing to misunderstandings between Mr. Kellogg and some of his people, the third year of his pastorate was not quite so pleasant as the two first. Rev. M. T. Gilley was the appointed pastor for the years 1877 and 1878. Mr. Gilley is spoken of as one of the most diligent pastors ever appointed over this church. He was constantly moving about among the people. He was successful in paying a debt of about two thousand dollars. Rev. J. M. Durrell became pastor in 1879, and continued in this position three years. Mr. Durrell from first to last was very popular with the people. He preached for three years to very large congregations. The people remember him kindly. His pastorate was eminently successful. Rev. William Eakins was appointed, and is now (1882) acting pastor. The church at the present time is in a very desirable position financially. Miss Martha Robinson left at her death about three thousand dollars to the society. Miss Robinson had been a very devoted member of the church for years, and in her death remembered the church she so faithfully served while in health. We are now well united, have large congregations, a flourishing Sunday-school, and we think have bright prospects in the future.

Humane Lodge, No. 28, F. and A. M.—The Hon. Jeremiah Hall Woodman, late of Rochester, is doubtless entitled to the honor of founding Humane Lodge, No. 21, A. F. and A. M. He was a son of the Rev. Joseph Woodman, the first settled minister, and a landed proprietor of Sauborn, N. H. He was educated at Dartmouth College, entered the legal profession, and settled in Rochester early in the present century. On the 25th day of October, 1809, a special communication of the Grand Lodge was held at the house of Mr. Andrew Lovejoy, near the old "Woodman" mansion, in Sanbornton. Edward J. Long was then Grand Master.

Mr. Woodman then presented the petition of several brethren, praying for the erection of a lodge at Rochester. At that time a dispensation was issued to Mr. Woodman, Timothy F. Preston, Benjamin Wiggin, and others to assemble as a lodge of Masons in the town of Rochester, and at a "quarterly communication of the Grand Lodge, held at Portsmouth on the 24th day of October, 1810, Clement Storer being Grand Master," a charter was granted to them to assemble under the title and denomination of "Humane Lodge, No. 21." The many eminent named in the early records of this organization predicted for this lodge a career of usefulness and honor. And so it has proved. Persecutions, prompted by misguided zeal, it bore long and bravely, yielding for a brief period to the popular prejudice. Again rallying and springing into new life, it has slowly but surely advanced towards its high standard of moral excellence and upright living.

More than two hundred and thirty members, residing in fourteen States and provinces, represent it in various professions and callings.

Of its benevolent mission we are silent. Those who have received its benefactions are best acquainted with their value.

The first Masonic funeral in Rochester was that of Stephen Brewster. He was the oldest son of Capt. John Brewster, of Rochester, who commanded the seventh company in Col. Pierce Long's regiment during the war of the Revolution. The regiment was organized Sept. 25, 1776. Six companies already enlisted were at Portsmouth. Capt. Brewster recruited the seventh in Rochester and vicinity, and on the 23d of November, 1776, Gen. Ward ordered the regiment to Ticonderoga, and it reached that fortress in February, 1777. The son (Stephen) was one of the first members of Humane Lodge, and, as already stated, was the first buried by the fraternity in this section of the State. (At that time the nearest lodge was in Portsmouth.) Hundreds of people came together at the funeral, prompted by curiosity, doubtless, to witness the novel ceremonies. He died April 9, 1819, at the age of forty-seven years. The burial-place of the Brewsters is situated about one mile west of Rochester village, and is marked by a fine monument of red sandstone, inclosed by a strong fence of iron and granite. The spot is nearly hidden from view by a thick growth of trees.

Kennedy Lodge, I. O. of O. E., was instituted Aug. 24, 1875, by Grand Master S. J. Osgood, assisted by Deputy Grand Master, G. A. Cummings; Grand Warden, A. F. Craig; Grand Secretary, Joel Taylor; Grand Treasurer, R. C. Fernald; and delegations from Dover, Great Falls, Farmington, Manchester, and Portsmouth. The charter members were Thomas Brown, Ira Doe, John Crockett, Charles W. Brown, Osman B. Warren, Wilbur F. Warren, John H. Pingree, and George W. Rollins, from Motolinia Lodge, No. 18; and James H. Warburton, from Miltonia Lodge, No. 52. Twenty-one were initiated the first evening, and the grand officers left a lodge of thirty members August 25th. The first principal officers of the lodge were Charles W. Brown, N. G.; Osman B. Warren, V. G.; Ira Doe, Sec.; and Thomas Brown, Treas.

Norway Plains Encampment, No. 7, I. O. of O. F., was instituted Sept. 11, 1849, by Past Grand Master, S. H. Parker. The charter members were Thomas Brown, Asa P. Hanson, Daniel W. Quimby, John James, Ira Doe, David Legro, and John L. Horn. The first officers were as follows, viz.: Thomas Brown, C. P.; Asa P. Hanson, H. P.; D. W. Quimby, S. W.; Ira Doe, Scribe; D. Legro, Treas.; John James, J. W.; and J. L. Horn, Sentinel. The encampment has always maintained its meetings, and now numbers one hundred and twenty members.

Motolinia Lodge, No. 18, I. O. of O. F.—The parent lodge of Odd-Fellowship in Rochester was instituted March 16, 1846, by Grand Master, S. H. Parker, of Dover, assisted by a delegation from Wechohamet and Mount Pleasant Lodges, in Dover, and Washington Lodge of Great Falls. Its charter members were Charles Dennett, Stephen M. Mathes, Jacob McDuffee, M. T. Curtis, and Edwin Bradbury, all from Washington Lodge, Great Falls. Its first officers were Asa P. Hanson, N. G.; S. M. Mathes, V. G.; Charles Dennett, R. Sec.; and George B. Roberts, Treas. This lodge has admitted five hundred and eighty-one members, and from it has been formed Woodbine Lodge, No. 41, of Farmington; Miltonia Lodge, No. 52, of Milton Mills; Kennedy Lodge, No. 57, and Cochecho Lodge, No. 39, of Rochester.

Manufactures.—The first incorporated company at Norway Plains was the Mechanics' Company, which commenced the manufacture of blankets in 1834, with a capital of fifteen thousand dollars. Previous to this there had been, besides the saw-mills, various kinds of business attempted at these falls. Several fulling- and finishing-mills had for years been prosperously conducted. The manufacture of nails, of scythes, of cotton yarn, and the distilling of brandy were carried on at one time or another with different degrees of success. The Mechanics' Company failed in 1841. It was followed by the Gonic Company, which soon came to a like end. Wetmore and Sturtevant took the remains. They soon separated, dividing privileges and mills between them. Wetmore eventually failed or abandoned the business. J. D. Sturtevant, by skill and business ability, succeeded. In 1846 other persons were admitted and the company was incorporated as the "Norway Plains Company."

E. G. & E. Wallace have at the village the largest shoe-manufactory, it is believed, in the State. In connection with it is a tanning and currying establishment. The Messrs. Wallace commenced with nothing, and by patient industry have built up a large business and made themselves wealthy.

There are other manufactures at Rochester village, the largest being the sash- and blind-factory of John H. Meserve.

At Gonic the late Hon. N. V. Whitehouse commenced machine wool-carding in 1833. In 1834 he added the manufacture of linseed oil. In 1838 he bought out Carr & Hibbard, who had failed in the business of making Guernsey cloth. He then commenced to make satinet, but in a few years changed to flannels. An incorporated company was afterwards formed, known as the Gonic Manufacturing Company, and new and larger mills were built.

At East Rochester, John Hall commenced manufacturing in the present mills just previous to the Rebellion. A company was incorporated soon after, with fifty thousand dollars capital, by the name of the Cochecho Woolen Manufacturing Company.

Schools.—The first reference to schools in the old town records is under date of 1750, when it voted to have a school. The following year they voted not to have a school. Several meetings were held during the year, and there seems to have been a determined effort on the part of a number of the inhabitants to have a school, but the majority voted that they would not have a school, and soon after a special meeting was held to choose agents to defend the town, which "lies under a presentiment for want of a school being kept, and to be heard and tried at the next Court of Quarter Sessions." The next year a school was kept sixteen weeks, and John Forst (Foss) was the master. He boarded round, and received less than ten dollars in silver for his services. School was maintained for a number of years, when the town relapsed, and voted that there should be no schoolmaster hired, but that they would pay the fine if recovered by presentment. Soon after, however, the better sentiment prevailed, the schools were well supported, and have been from this time to the present.

The Rochester Academy.—As early as 1820 efforts were made for the removal of the Newmarket Wesleyan Academy to Rochester. The project failed. An interest, however, had been awakened, which resulted, June 30, 1827, in the incorporation of the "Rochester Academy." The academy building was erected in 1828, and October 31st of that year the school opened with James Towne, A.M., as principal. His successors were as follows: C. W. Woodman, Lewis Turner, Mr. Ingersoll, F. Goodwin, L. N. Tracy, C. Hamlin, A. P. Clute, George Mathes, J. C. Ingalls, H. C. Hunt, Jeremiah H. W. Colby, David F. Drew, Joseph W. Drew, Jarvis McDuffee, and Rev. A. B. Worthing. For fifteen or twenty years this academy was a useful and flourishing institution.

Post-Offices.—The post-office at Rochester was established March 26, 1812, with William Barker as postmaster. The following is a list of postmasters from 1812 to the present time, with dates of appointment: William Barker, March 26, 1812; John B. Buzzel, Aug. 5, 1815; David Barker, Jr., Oct. 15, 1818; Humphrey Hanson, July 8, 1823; John McDuffee, Jr., Aug. 4, 1826; William S. Ricker, Aug. 14, 1829; John H. THE GONIC OFFICE was established Jan. 28, 1851, and the following is the list of postmasters: C. S. Whitehouse, Jan. 28, 1851; Downing Varney, Dec. 27, 1856; Henry W. Locke, Aug. 2, 1861; E. F. Whitehouse, March 13, 1862; C. S. Whitehouse, Oct. 2, 1865; George Roberts, Jan. 28, 1868; C. S. Whitehouse,<sup>1</sup> July 19, 1869.

THE EAST ROCHESTER OFFICE was established June 2, 1863. Postmasters: Stephen F. Shorey, June 2, 1863; Moses S. Hurd, April 13, 1865; S. S. Hart, July 8, 1867; Larkin Harrington, Dec. 22, 1870; and James Walker, present incumbent, May 16, 1871.

During the first three months the office at Rochester yielded a revenue of $5.07. During the six months following the revenue amounted to $7.99. In 1826, for three months the amount of receipts at the office was $25.76, of which $3.08 was for postage on newspapers, the remainder being for letter postage. The postmaster's commissions for these three months amounted to $8,511. For three years and three months from Aug. 4, 1826, the total receipts of the office were only $238.97.

The Rochester Courier was established and its first number printed Jan. 17, 1864, by J. Frank Place, a native of Gonic, but who had served his time in the Lawrence (Mass.) American office, and came forth a practical printer and an excellent writer. He sold out in 1867 to George G. Foster, of Acworth, N. H., who edited the paper until January, 1868, when Charles W. Folsom became connected with it, and in October of 1869 purchased the establishment, and has been editor and proprietor to the present time. Mr. Folsom twice enlarged the Courier, making it a large thirty-two-column paper, containing much of local interest. Mr. Folsom, having been from his earliest days identified with Rochester and its interests, has made the paper intensely local. It is one of the best local journals in the State, and justly merits its present prosperity.

The Anti-Monopolist and Local Record.—In the fall of 1878 the exigencies of the times seemed to demand a new political party in New Hampshire, and that new men should run the ship of State. The Republican and Democratic parties had outlived their usefulness, and the projectors of the Anti-Monopolist thought the sooner hic jacet and requiescat in pace was written on their tombstones the better for the people.

The new party had sprung up like a mushroom in the West, and was already gaining great headway in the East, Massachusetts and Maine having a large number of converts to the new faith, and it was in the latter State that the senior projectors of this paper was speaking in the interests of the new party when it was decided to start the new venture for public patronage and approval.

Saturday, Oct. 19, 1878, the first number of the paper was issued, Moses Hull being its political editor and George G. Berry its local editor and publisher. Mr. Hull had previously run a newspaper in Boston, and owned a printing-office there, which office was removed to Rochester and combined with the office of Mr. Berry, who had been located here in the job-printing business for several years. The paper was started under the firm-name of George G. Berry & Co., and was a success from the start.

The demand for a paper for local news was considerable, and this with the new political departure secured it sufficient patronage to make it successful from the start. That it had enemies is true, but they were treated the same as though they were friends; and the heresies of the new paper, as they were called, soon began to gain converts, and the paper has been steadily going on its course ever since.

Jan. 25, 1879, Moses Hull retired from the editorial control of the political department of the paper, giving his interest to his brother, D. W. Hull, who was then in Michigan practicing medicine. He at once came to Rochester and commenced his labors, conducting that department with ability until the 1st of April, when failing health, through hard work, obliged him to leave the office, his interest and that of his brother Moses being purchased by George G. Berry, the latter at this time taking entire control of the paper.

Aug. 20, 1881, Frank H. Berry, son of Mr. George G. Berry, was taken into partnership, and the paper has since been run under the firm-name of George G. Berry & Co.

The paper has always been free and outspoken on every subject, bold, independent, and fearless, never afraid to criticize or condemn a wrong action, whether the person doing the wrong was rich or poor, high or low, and has always advocated the cause of the poor and oppressed against the capitalists and corporations.

Nov. 12, 1881, the Anti-Monopolist was enlarged to a seven column sheet, giving a much greater amount of reading matter for the same money, viz., one dollar per year. It is now the cheapest paper of its size in the county.

The Anti-Monopolist was the first Greenback paper in New Hampshire.

The Social Library was established in 1792, and the following is a list of the librarians from that time to the present: Joseph Clark, Joseph Haven, Joseph Hanson, Thomas Shannon, William Shannon, Joseph Bullard, Joseph Clark, Andrew Pierce, Joseph Sherburne, Jeremiah H. Woodman, Joseph Haven, Joseph Cross, John Smith, David Barker, Jr., Noah Tibbetts, Rufus K. Pearl, Daniel J. Parsons, Cyrus K. Sanborn, A. S. Parshey, and Henry Kimball.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

FRANKLIN McDUFFEE,

son of John and Joanna (Hanson) McDuffee, was born at Dover, Aug. 27, 1832. Six months after he removed with his parents to Rochester, where he spent the remainder of his life. He entered Gilmanton Academy at the early age of twelve, and graduated with honor at Dartmouth College in 1853. He read law six months with Hon. Daniel M. Christie, of Dover, and in May, 1854, accepted the position of cashier of the Rochester State Bank. In 1857 he went on a foot-trip to the White Mountains. Owing to the wrong directions of a guide he was lost in the forest a night and a day, almost perishing from cold and exhaustion. The first house reached was that of Dr. Bemis, then absent. Acting under strict orders to admit no one, the family in charge utterly refused to furnish him food or shelter, so that he was obliged to go six miles farther, to the Notch House, before getting relief. This exposure weakened his constitution, impaired his hearing, and was doubtless the remote cause of his death. By his physician's advice he took a voyage to Europe the next year. He applied for passage home in the ill-fated "Austria," which was burned with all her passengers, but failing to secure a satisfactory berth he escaped. He received much benefit from this trip, though his brother, John Randolph McDuffee, who went out with him in good health, immediately fell into a decline, and died soon after his return.

Dec. 4, 1861, he married Fanny Hayes, of Rochester. Their children are John, Edgar, and Willis. The former entered the class of 1883, in the Scientific Department of Dartmouth College, but was forced to leave on account of his health. The younger son is pursuing his studies in the Rochester high school.

Mr. McDuffee was appointed treasurer of the Norway Plains Savings-Bank in 1866, and held the position through life. Two years later his father and he established a private banking institution under the name of "John McDuffee & Co., bankers." In 1871 this company merged into the Rochester National Bank, of which he became cashier, and held the office through life.

He was initiated in Humane Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons, Dec. 9, 1856. The next year he was chosen Secretary, and after filling other offices was Master of the lodge in 1863-64. In 1866 and 1867 he officiated as District Deputy of the Grand Lodge of New Hampshire.

He served the town as selectman, and many years as superintending school committee; was a member of the State Legislature of 1862, and the Constitutional Convention of 1876. He joined the Congregational Church in 1868, and four years after was chosen deacon, which office he continued to hold till his death. After a sickness of a few weeks he died at Rochester, Nov. 11, 1880, aged forty-eight years, two months, and fifteen days.

The character of Deacon McDuffee was one of rare excellence, blending many valuable traits. As a lad he was studious, thoughtful, kind, and mature beyond his years. He was well fitted for college at the age of sixteen, though he delayed entering till a year later. He was thorough and exact in his studies, and ranked high at graduation. One of his instructors wrote, "I remember Mr. McDuffee well as a faithful and exemplary student, deserving and receiving the esteem of his instructors and associates. It was always a pleasure to me to see him in the class-room." Another says, "I recall him as a good scholar, industrious, faithful, and honest, but very modest and retiring." Highly esteemed by all his classmates, he had few intimates, but those few were deeply attached to him, and the ties then formed were never broken. He always loved his Alma Mater, and when, unsought by himself, his name was prominently mentioned in alumni circles as a candidate to fill a vacancy on the board of trustees, he remarked to a friend that he should regard such an appointment a greater honor than to be Governor of New Hampshire.

He took a deep interest in national affairs, and had a clear understanding of political issues. He was no managing politician, but, simply firm to force of character, he was a leader in his party. Men irrespective of party recognized his leadership in affairs of public interest. He did not win men by flattery, or by neutrality on important questions. All men knew him for a staunch Republican, an unflinching friend of temperance and good order. He had decision, energy, and sturdy pluck, without malice or bitterness, so that even opponents respected his conscientious integrity. He was not unfrequently able to carry a vote against a current already strongly set the other way, simply by his strong, honest, clear way of stating the case. Men always listened when he rose to speak, knowing his words would be sincere and to the point. He never attempted to speak when he had nothing to say. He studied no graces of oratory. He indulged in no flowers of rhetoric. He drove like a rifle-ball straight for the mark, and never failed to hit. Hence he was recognized as one of the best and most entertaining lecturers in Strafford County.

He took a deep interest in education. He was zealous and untiring in efforts to elevate the schools in Rochester. To none more than to him the high school owes its present standing and success.

From his well-known ability and interest in historical research, he was elected a member of the New Hampshire Historical Society. In 1865 he began a series of historical sketches in the Rochester Courier, which are models of simplicity, conciseness, and accuracy. He intended to rewrite and enlarge these sketches into a complete history of the town, and with much labor had collected considerable material for this purpose. His premature death unfortunately left the work unfinished.

His mind was essentially mathematical, with keen powers of analytic thought. Flowers of rhetoric could not cover false logic from his eye, which detected shams at a glance. His power of methodical analysis was well illustrated in his mountain adventure. When he found he was lost, he knew the attempt to go on in the night would only increase his perplexity, besides the danger from unseen precipices. Having no means of kindling a fire, he could only ward off a fatal chill by continued exercise. He therefore chose a level spot of a few rods' length between two large trees, and paced back and forth from one tree to the other all night. While thus walking he went over in careful thought the whole day's journey, studying step by step to find his error. In this way he came to a definite conclusion as to just where he had left the true path, and just what course to pursue in the morning. The theory proved true in every particular, and brought him out in safety.

In 1876 he obtained a patent on a valuable "Improvement in Combination and Chronometer Locks," which he sold to a lock manufacturing company for five hundred dollars. This invention secures two principal advantages: first, that any accidental stopping of the clock-work will not prevent the opening of the lock; and second, that it can be opened between the hours for which it may be set only by assembling too many persons for a burglar's safety. His methodical turn of mind fitted him especially for business, in which he was a model of diligence, exactness, and integrity. No crookedness or obscurity ever darkened his financial transactions. His partial loss of hearing, added to his retiring nature, withdrew him somewhat from social life, and his quiet, unobtrusive ways left others of far less merit to be more widely known than he. But his neighbors and townsmen highly appreciated his sterling worth, and his intimates prized his friendship as of one of the sincerest and most lovable of men. His firm and substantial character was beautified and crowned with the graces of a Christian life. His religion, like every other part of his character, was genuine. No affected holiness or pious drivell marred its excellent simplicity. Shrinking and sensitive, his religion avoided all boastful display. It was, nevertheless, all-pervading, shining in and through his life, leaving a light behind to guide others to the heavenward path. He was long distrustful and doubting in regard to his own experience. But when he once decided to identify himself with the Church of Christ, it was a transaction forever. His daily life exemplified the truths he believed. He was pre-eminently meek under abuse. When a temporary cloud came upon the savings-bank, consens of integrity, he was calm and quiet under vituperation. He would patiently answer questions and explain the bank affairs to every interested party; but when, leaving inquiry, any began to rage and revile he would quietly turn to his books, as if not hearing a word. Quick in sympathy, he was nobly generous in every worthy cause. The poor were among his sincerest mourners. Unostentatious in his gifts, many a needy one was relieved, only suspecting whence the favor came. He was emphatically "a pillar in the church," a friend and helper of every pastor, an active supporter of every good work, a model church officer. His death was a severe loss, not only to family and church, but to town and State. Few worthier or more valuable men ever claimed the Granite State for their home than Deacon Franklin McDuffee.

"The memory of the just is blessed."

JOHN McDUFFEE.

To men of their own energetic stock, who, refusing all political preferment, have given comprehensive abilities, sterling integrity, and sagacious industry to the development of business, many New Hampshire towns owe an imperishable debt. John McDuffee's record is in the prosperity of Rochester.

The name itself suggests that strong Scotch-Irish blood which endured the siege of Londonderry, in which were Mr. McDuffee's ancestors, John McDuffee and his wife Martha, honored in tradition. John and Martha McDuffee had four sons, viz.: Mansfield, Archibald, John, and Daniel. Mansfield went to London, England; the other three came with their parents to America in the emigration which gave New Hampshire the powerful stock of Derry and Londonderry. John, the father of these sons, settled in Rochester in 1729, on land on the east side of the Cochocho River, adjoining Gonie Lower Falls, the farm of eighty-five acres remaining without break in the family, and now owned by the subject of this article. The Rochester settler was, as just stated, the father of Daniel McDuffee, and also of Col. John McDuffee, a gallant officer in the old French and Revolutionary wars, lieutenant-colonel in Col. Poor's regiment, who, never marrying, adopted his brother Daniel's son John, and eventually made him his heir. John, the colonel's heir, was a farmer in good circumstances, married Abigail, daughter of Simon and Sarah (Ham) Torr, and was father of John McDuffee, the subject of this sketch, who was born on the farm once the colonel's, about a mile and a half from Rochester village, on the Dover road, Dec. 6, 1803.

Of course while working on the farm more or less he had for five or more years the advantage of a good school kept at the village by "Master" Henry H. Orne (D. C. 1812), of severe discipline and good scholarship, who supplemented the public school with a private one each autumn. Mr. Orne was a very successful teacher, and among the associates of John McDuffee in this school were Thomas C. Upham, Nathaniel G. Upham, John P. Hale, and Noah Tibbets. In 1818, at the age of fifteen, the boy entered Franklin Academy in Dover, the first day of its existence, Thomas E. Sawyer and Richard Kimball being among his associates, and Rev. Mr. Thayer being its principal. Here he fitted to enter college as sophomore, but returned home, and at the age of eighteen he went into the store of his uncle, John Greenfield, at Rochester. It was a large country store, where everything was sold. After two years' experience, being only twenty years of age, he began the same business for himself on the same square, was successful, and after two years took into partnership his uncle, Jonathan H. Torr. During this period he was commissioned postmaster of Rochester, being not of age when appointed, and he held this office until removed on Jackson's accession to the Presidency.

In the spring of the year 1831 he went to Dover, and began the same business on a broader scale, first in the Perkins Block, and in the autumn as the first tenant of the northern store in the new Watson Block, on the Landing, Ira Christie his next southern neighbor. This locality, now at an end for such purposes, was then the place of business and offices. Steady success continued to reward his energy and industry, but in February, 1833, selling to Andrew Pierce, Jr., he returned to Rochester to settle the large estate of his wife's father, Joseph Hanson, who, dying in December previous, had made him executor. Mr. Hanson, whose daughter Joanna (by his marriage with Charity Dame), Mr. McDuffee had married, June 21, 1829, was one of the three old and wealthy merchants of Rochester, Nathaniel Upham and Jonas C. March being the other two. The settlement of this extended estate and business was completed and the accounts settled by Mr. McDuffee's energy in seven months; and it caused his entire abandonment of trade, although he had been eminently successful.

There was no bank in Rochester. Old traders had some connection with the Strafford Bank in Dover, and the Rockingham Bank in Portsmouth. They loaned money instead of getting discounts. Mr. Hanson's safe, where he kept all his securities, was a small brick building back of his store, with a sheet-iron door fastened by a padlock. He kept some deposits, however, in Strafford Bank, and was a stockholder in that and in the Rockingham Bank. The three principal traders used to go to Boston twice a year on horseback to buy goods. Mr. McDuffee saw that a bank was needed. He prepared the plans, secured signatures, obtained a charter from the Legislature in 1834, and the Rochester Bank was organized with ninety stockholders, and a capital of one hundred thousand dollars, later increased to one hundred and twenty thousand dollars, with one hundred and thirty stockholders. Of the original ninety, only two besides Mr. McDuffee now survive. On the organization he became cashier, his brother-in-law, Dr. James Farrington (member of the Twenty-fifth Congress), being president. The bank was the frontier bank, no other existing between Rochester and Canada, and it was the first bank which the counterfeiters from Canada naturally but uselessly struck. It was a favorite of the people, and was so managed that its dividends were eight or nine per cent. It is well known that the business was really left to the probity and skill of its cashier. Cashier for twenty years, on the then renewal of its charter, Mr. McDuffee resigned the cashiership in favor of his son Franklin, and became president. The bank did not become a national bank until 1874, and in the six years previous he and his son formed the house of "John McDuffee & Co., private bankers," took up the old bank's business, and successfully carried it on. In 1874 they merged it in a national bank, the one being president and the other cashier, as before, and the two taking two-fifths of its stock. It is an interesting fact that no bill has ever been issued by either Rochester Bank without the well-known signature of John McDuffee, either as president or cashier; and he still actively administers the interests of the bank he originated in another form forty-eight years ago.

In addition to this Rochester interest, Mr. McDuffee was one of the original grantees of the Dover National Bank, and for a short time was a director; but his interest became more in the Strafford Bank, at Dover, of which (new charter) he was the second heaviest stockholder, Daniel M. Christie being the first. He became a director in the Strafford National Bank in 1870, and still actively holds that position. The stock of this bank (par, one hundred dollars) has this year sold at one hundred and sixty dollars.

The Norway Plains Savings-Bank, at Rochester, was chartered in 1851, and Mr. McDuffee became its treasurer, being succeeded by his son Franklin in 1867, and himself becoming president, an office in which he still remains. It is worth recalling that although this bank was ordered, in the panic, to pay out only five-sixths of any deposit, it subsequently petitioned for leave to pay, and did credit to every person affected, the remaining sixth.

Mr. McDuffee early saw the advantages of manufacturing to a community. By his own means and a liberal allowance of banking facilities he has greatly aided their development, the first such enterprise in Rochester, the Mechanics' Manufacturing Company, being decided to locate there by the new banking facilities. Mr. McDuffee was a director. It was a manufacture of blankets, and its successor is the Norway Plains Manufacturing Company. The original company Mr. McDuffee carried safely through the crisis of 1837. The mill property at Gonic Mr. McDuffee bought in 1845 to lease to N. V. Whitehouse, that the business might not be given up. He held his purchase for about ten years. The effort was successful, and the property was eventually taken by a joint-stock company. Stephen Shorey, owning some facilities for manufacturing at East Rochester, came to Mr. McDuffee to see if the bank would advance means to build. Mr. McDuffee at once pledged the means, and the mills were built. A stock company afterwards purchased mills and machinery, and the thriving village of East Rochester owes its prosperity to Mr. McDuffee's liberal policy. Thus have been developed the three principal water-powers of Rochester.

Mr. McDuffee's personal interests in manufacturing were also in the Great Falls Manufacturing Company, in whose great business he was a director for four years. Capital, one million five hundred thousand dollars. In 1862 he bought large interests in the Cocheco Manufacturing Company, and has there reained. Since 1874 he has been a director of that corporation. As such he advocated the erection of the great mill, now No. 1, and the replacing of all the old buildings by new and magnificent mills, unsurpassed in the United States,—a work now rapidly progressing. The remarkable success of this company certifies alike to the sagacious boldness and the considerate policy of its directors.

The need of railroad facilities at Rochester was early apparent to Mr. McDuffee. In 1846 he entered into two enterprises,—the Cocheo Road, from Dover to Alton Bay, and Conway Road, from Great Falls to Conway. Each was to and did pass through Rochester. In each road Mr. McDuffee was the largest individual stockholder, and of each was the first treasurer. When the Conway Road reached Rochester Mr. McDuffee resigned its trusteeship. The other road, after various difficulties, became the Dover and Winnepesaukee by the incorporation of the bondholders, and Mr. McDuffee continued to be a director. With "friend" William Hill he visited Boston more than thirty times to treat for the lease of this road to the Boston and Maine. The effort was finally successful, and the road, by itself weak, became a fine piece of property. Rochester was thus doubly accommodated; but another avenue was needed, and Mr. McDuffee took part in the Portland and Rochester, which secured a route eastward, of which road he was a director; and he invested liberally in the Rochester and Nashua, which opened a line to the West. The result has been that Rochester is a "billings-point," and its various manufacturing interests have felt its impetus.

The beauty of "McDuffee Block" in Rochester, built by him in 1868, exhibits the owner's public spirit. It is an elegant brick building of four stories, containing six stores, twelve offices in the second story, a public hall in the third, and a Masonic hall, one of the finest in the State, in the fourth. In the use of the public hall the liberality of its owner to benevolent objects is well known. As a Mason he joined Humane Lodge on the very day he became "of lawful age."

Of other real estate Mr. McDuffee has, besides various pieces in Rochester, including such as the Gonic farm, the New Durham "powder-mill" estate of nine hundred acres of land and eleven hundred acres of water, and in Barrington two hundred acres on Isinglass River, held with a view to future manufacturing needs.

In religion. Mr. McDuffee was brought up under good old Parson Joseph Haven, and has remained a liberal supporter of the Congregational Society. In politics, he was an earnest Whig. His first vote was for the electors who chose John Quincy Adams President, and his postmastership was ended by Andrew Jackson. He has always been a decided Republican.

Mr. McDuffee's great amount of labor has been possible only by the vigorous constitution which he inherited. The boy who before he left home "carried the forward swath" in the hay-field made the man who now accomplishes an amount of work which would surprise many younger men. Monday is always given to the Stratford Bank at Dover; Tuesday he presides at the Rochester Bank meeting; Wednesday, at the Savings-Bank; and no day is idle.

Of Mr. McDuffee's happy domestic relations nothing need be said. Of his eight children, naming them in the order of birth, (1) Joseph, who followed the sea, died (single) on the ocean, at the age of thirty-five. (2) Franklin, who graduated at Dartmouth College in 1853, died, after a successful financial career, Nov. 11, 1880, greatly lamented; he married Mary Fannie, daughter of John Hayes, of Farmington, and left two sons, John Edgar (now in the Chandler Scientific Department of Dartmouth College) and Willis. (3) John Randolph graduated at the Chandler Scientific Department in 1857, was a civil engineer in Rochester, and died single, aged twenty-five. (4) Anna M. is the wife of Frank S. Brown, of Hartford, Conn., of the firm of Brown, Thompson & Co. She has one son and two daughters. (5) Mary Abbie is the wife of Charles K. Chase, a merchant in Rochester, and has two daughters. (6) Sarah died single. (7) George, the only surviving son, is engaged in extensive grain, mill, and lumber business in Rochester. He married, first, Lizzie Hanson, who died, leaving a son; afterwards he married, second, Nellie, daughter of Dr. James Farrington, of Rochester, her father being nephew of Dr. James Farrington, M.C. (8) Oliver, died in infancy.

Judged by the success of his work as a banker, as developing by a liberal and wise help every worthy manufacturing enterprise, and as foremost in the building of the various railways centering in Rochester, it is clear that Mr. McDuffee nobly comes into the list of those spoken of in our first paragraph, whose record is in the prosperity of his native town, where ability, sagacity, integrity, and kindness have united to make that record, as well as his own personal success.

DOMINICUS HANSON.

Dominicus Hanson, son of Joseph and Charity (Dame) Hanson, was born in the same house in Rochester, N. H., where he now (1882) resides, Aug. 23, 1813.

His father was born in Dover, N. H., Dec. 18, 1764, and died at Rochester, N. H., Dec. 19, 1832. He married Charity Dame, March 4, 1798. She was born at Rochester, Sept. 1, 1775, and died Feb. 3, 1833. They had ten children,—

(1) Humphrey (deceased), a druggist.

(2) Mary D. (deceased), wife of Dr. James Farrington, (deceased), of Rochester, a distinguished physician and member of Congress from New Hampshire.

- (3) Hannah, died in infancy.
 (4) Joseph S., died at twenty-five; was a druggist.
 (5) Meribah (deceased), wife of Dr. Joseph H. Smith, now of Lowell, Mass.
 (6) Joanna (Mrs. John McDuffee, of Rochester). See biography of John McDuffee.
 (7) An infant not named.
 (8) Hester Ann (deceased), Mrs. Daniel M. Mooney.
 (9) Dominicus, the subject of our sketch.
 (10) Asa P., a corn and flour dealer in Newton City, Iowa.

Joseph Hanson came to Rochester from Dover when a young man, and immediately engaged in the general grocery and mercantile business, which he successfully followed till within a few years of his death. He was a man of excellent judgment, good common sense, shrewd, cautious, industrious, and economical. He built the first brick store ever erected in Stratford County, probably about 1819 or 1822. It had a tin roof, and the doors and window-shutters were of tin also. At a very early day he made a brick vault for the safe deposit of his papers, etc. He inaugurated many useful schemes which have had a tendency for good, and his name is held in grateful remembrance by those who knew him. He was justly considered one of the best business men of his day, and his ample fortune left to his family fully attests this estimate of him. He was a Whig in politics, but was averse to holding any office, preferring to attend to his own private matters, hence his great success for one of those days.

Mrs. Hanson was a member of the Methodist Church, and he was an attendant and supporter of the various churches, though not a member of any, rather leaning towards Universalism.

Dominicus Hanson received the advantages of a common-school education until he was some fifteen years of age, and this was supplemented by an academic education at Rochester Academy, Parsonsfield Seminary, Me., Hopkinton, N. H., and at Pembroke, N. H. In 1830 he commenced the drug business as an apprentice to his brother-in-law, Dr. Smith, and served him two years, when in 1832 he bought Dr. Smith's interest, and has continued in the business ever since, except some two or three years when away at school.

As an evidence of the confidence reposed in Mr. Hanson as an honest and trustworthy gentleman, we may mention that, at the earnest solicitation of the business men of his native town, he issued scrip of the respective denominations—10 cts., 25 cts., and 50 cts.—to the amount of $8000, which reads as follows:

State of New Hampshire, Rochester, Sept. 27, 1862. For value received, I promise to pay ——— on demand, in current Bank Bills, in sums of one dollar and upwards, at my place of business.

DOMINICUS HANSON.

This scrip was issued when there was a scarcity of circulating money during the great civil war, and before the general government had issued any money. This scrip circulated throughout New England, and was never refused. All of which was promptly redeemed when the general government made its issue.

“Honest Dominicus, as he has been known by his friends for long years. Who ever saw the goodly village of Rochester Plains but has seen his prim pressed-brick two-story apothecary store, with its circular front, once the most stylish store in the whole State of New Hampshire; its long-remembered and excellent brick sidewalk in front, dating back to time immemorial, before this prospective city knew the luxury of sidewalks; its broad stone steps, always a delight to the innumerable patrons of this popular resort, who climb them with assurance of safe foothold and excellent reception beyond? If Noah could by any means be compelled to refit and rearrange the ark, and take in all that he considered necessary to stock a new world, he couldn't collect the six or eight million invaluable articles which are here gathered together from the four corners of the earth (or is coming the next day), unless he had the nearly miraculous experience of our subject, and to acquire such an experience would cost a frightful expenditure of both time and money. Mr. Hanson is now (1882) sixty-nine years of age, rather less than six feet in height, stands erect, possesses rather a commanding figure, moves quickly, like an active young man of twenty-five. His hair, always inclined to brown, is silvered with age. He is of a markedly nervous organization, his thin-cut face bearing its certain evidence. Nothing about the face or general appearance of our subject is strongly marked above many other men you may meet in the course of a day's ride in any portion of Yankee land; by that sign you can judge the man. If ever wit and drollery overflowed in one person, here it is. I know of no two faces in the country that so nearly resemble each other as that of 'Honest Dominicus' and the happy countenance of America's humorist, 'Mark Twain.' The general impression left by the two faces is the same, the same mysterious gleam, sure token of the mental flash occurs in each, and the wit and humor of each is fully recognized among their friends. The parallel holds good still further, in neither case can the purpose or intent be solved. A matter of the lightest import may be treated with ponderous gravity befitting a funeral oration, and while either of the two are discoursing with lengthened faces upon the topic the bystanders are convulsed with laughter. On the contrary, many things which bewilder the brains of common people are heartily laughed at by them. Either of these worthies are a puzzle to their many friends, and like all human enigmas, of course they are idolized. But Mr. Hanson is a study. In him lie the gentle graces, geniality, cute Yankee sense, and the subtle and evanescent essence of fun. In him dwells a constant gleam of drollery always welcome as sunshine in winter or flowers in May. The mirth which overflows in his happy moments is all the more welcome because of the uncertainty of its aim. It may be gentle invective of society's shams; perhaps a tinge of sarcasm wittily said lightens his efforts."

In politics he has been a lifelong Democrat of the old school. He was an earnest supporter of Gen. Jackson for the Presidency for his second term, though not old enough to vote. He cast his first Presidential vote for Martin Van Buren, and has voted at every election since. Without his knowledge he was appointed postmaster of his native village by Gen. Jackson ere his majority, and he continued to hold the same position under Van Buren and Harrison's administrations. He has been director of the Norway Plains Savings-Bank for many years.

He married Betsey S., daughter of Simon Chase, a prominent merchant in Rochester, Sept. 19, 1839. She was born in Milton Aug. 4, 1814. Of this union two sons have been born,—Charles A. C., born in Rochester, Aug. 18, 1844, and George W., born July 6, 1854, and died Jan. 6, 1856.

DR. JAMES FARRINGTON.

James Farrington, M.D., son of Elijah and Lois L. Farrington, was born in Conway, N. H., June 10, 1822. His paternal great-grandfather was Stephen Farrington, who was born at Andover, Mass., about 1706-10, settled at Concord, N. H., where he followed the occupation of a farmer. He married Apphia Bradley, and had children,—Stephen, John, Jeremiah, Samuel, and four daughters, names not known, all born at Concord, N. H. Stephen Farrington died at the residence of his son Samuel, at Hopkinton, N. H., in 1791, being upwards of eighty years of age.

Jeremiah Farrington, third son of Stephen, was a native of Concord, N. H., removed to Conway at an early day, and was there engaged as a farmer on the Saco River. He married Molly Swan, and had children,—Hannah, Polly, Stephen (a farmer), Elijah (born September, 1784), James (M.D.), Nancy, and Jeremiah (a farmer). He was a member of the Congregational Church, and died at a ripe old age, some eighty-four years.

Elijah Farrington was born at Conway, N. H., in 1784, and died June 3, 1863. He married March 5, 1814. Mrs. Farrington was born Dec. 25, 1793. Of this union two sons and one daughter were born,—Albert E., who is now (1882) an enterprising farmer in Union; Mary H. (deceased), wife of Capt. Samuel Haselton, of Conway, N. H.; and James, M.D., the immediate subject of this sketch.

Elijah Farrington was an industrious, thrifty farmer in Conway, N. H. He was prudent and economical, and a man respected by all. He held some of the minor offices of his native town with credit to himself and satisfaction to his constituents. His wife (Mrs. Lois L. Farrington) is now (June, 1882) residing with her youngest son and child, Dr. James Farrington, of Rochester, N. H. She is nearly eighty-nine years of age, yet she retains her faculties to a wonderful degree. She can recall the scenes of the past as though they were but as yesterday, and tell of the times and ways of the long ago with credit to herself and to the amusement and benefit of those who listen. For nearly sixty years she has been a worthy member of the Congregational Church, and now in her verdant old age (in years, not in spirits) she reviews the past with no apprehension of the future.

James Farrington, M.D., was reared on the farm and early learned the cardinal principles, industry and economy, so necessary in every successful life. He attended the common schools of his native town till he was sixteen years of age, when he went to Fryeburg Academy, at Fryeburg, Me., where he fitted for college. During all the years while he was getting his acadeimical and medical education he was obliged to teach winters in order to get the funds necessary to pursue his studies. He was a good and faithful boy while at home on the farm, a diligent student at school, and a successful teacher. In 1841 he commenced the study of medicine with Dr. Ira Towle, of Fryeburg, Me., and remained with him till 1846. During the year 1844 he attended one course of lectures at Dartmouth College. He graduated from the Medical Department of the University of New York City in the spring of 1847, and in March of the same year graduated from Dr. Whittaker's medical school. In May, 1847, he began the practice of medicine in Rochester, N. H., and was associated with his uncle, James Farrington, M.D., one of the most distinguished and successful practitioners in New Hampshire at that time, a member of Congress, and an upright and influential citizen. Upon the death of his uncle, in 1859, he succeeded to the entire practice, and has continued till the present (1882). His ride extends into all the adjoining towns, and he is often called as a consulting physician. He is a member of the Strafford District Medical Society and the New Hampshire Medical Society, and has contributed essays on various subjects of interest to the profession. In politics he is a Democrat. He has always been interested in the cause of temperance, and has used his influence in that direction. He has held some of the more important offices of his town, and in 1863 was chosen to represent Rochester in the State Legislature. For many years he has been a director of the First National Bank, Rochester, and the Norway Plains Savings-Bank, Rochester. He was elected high priest of Temple Chapter, in Rochester, at its organization, and has held the same position ever since, except one year. He is also a member of St. Paul Commandery, Knights Templar, of Dover, N. H. He married Harriet L., daughter of Simon Chase (see biography of Charles K. Chase, Rochester, N. H.), Feb. 27, 1851. They have two daughters, viz.:

(1) Nellie F., born Nov. 18, 1854, married Dec. 25, 1879, George McDuffee, son of John McDuffee (see McDuffee history); (2) Josephine C., born Sept. 13, 1859, married Dec. 25, 1879, Arthur V. Sanborn, a furniture dealer in Rochester. They have one son, James F., born Sept. 4, 1880.

DR. ISAAC W. LOUGEE.

Among the many prominent business men and professional gentlemen whose names appear in this work, none is held in greater respect than he of whom we write, Dr. Isaac Williams Lougee, son of John F. Lougee, was born at Gilmanton, N. H., Aug. 1, 1818. His father was a native of Exeter, N. H., settled at Gilmanton, N. H., where he followed the occupation of a farmer. He had children,—Joseph S., who died at twenty-five; Isaac W.; William S., who died at twenty-nine; and Elizabeth M., wife of L. S. Nute, of Alton, N. H.

John F. Lougee died in Rochester, Jan. 16, 1880, aged ninety-three years and nine months. His father was Joseph, who was born at Exeter, N. H. Joseph was a son of John, of Exeter, and John was a son of John Lougee, who came to this country from the island of Jersey in 1713, at the age of eighteen years, and settled in that part of Exeter now Newmarket. He married a Gilman, of Exeter, and had several sons and daughters. All of the name now in this country are descendants of him.

Samuel Lougee, son of Joseph, died young of typhus fever; the remaining members of the family, parents and children, ten in all, lived to the average age of eighty-three years and three months, one still alive.

Dr. William Smith, maternal grandfather of Dr. Lougee, was born in Kingston, N. H., and settled in Gilmanton in 1767, being the first physician in the town, and had an extensive practice for many years in that and adjoining towns. He died at the age of ninety-three years and six months. He was a man of sterling principles, and did much in promoting the educational, moral, and religious interests of the town in its early history. His family consisted of two sons and seven daughters; one died young; the remainder of the family lived to the average age of more than eighty-four years. They were all members of the Congregational Church.

Dr. Lougee received a common school education, attended select schools taught by Rev. Charles G. Safford and Hon. George G. Fogg, and Gilmanton Academy. He commenced the study of medicine with Dr. Otis French, of Gilmanton, and attended medical lectures at Hanover and Woodstock, Vt. He graduated from the Medical Department of Dartmouth College in the class of 1845, and in November of the same year began the practice of medicine at New Durham, N. H. In 1847 he located at Alton, where he continued for twenty-one years. In 1868 he came to Rochester, N. H., and bought out Dr. James Farrington. Subsequently they formed a copartnership, and were in practice together some ten years, since which time Dr. Lougee has continued in practice at Rochester. He is a member of the Strafford District Medical Society, of which he has been president, besides holding various minor offices. He is also a member of the State Medical Society, in which he has held responsible positions. In 1862 he was appointed by Governor Berry examining surgeon for Belknap County.

He is a Republican in politics. Very early in life he espoused the cause of freedom, and was always bitterly opposed to the extension of slavery. For more than forty years he has been a zealous advocate of all questions of moral reform, and his abundant opportunities have not been misimproved.

He was postmaster at Alton during the administrations of Presidents Taylor and Fillmore. In 1866 and 1867 he represented Alton in the State Legislature, during which time he had the satisfaction of voting for the fourteenth amendment of the United States Constitution. In 1877 and 1878 he represented Rochester in the Legislature, serving the last year as chairman of the committee on asylums for the insane.

He is a member of the Congregational Church, and takes an active interest in the cause of temperance. He has been twice married,—first to Julia A., daughter of Thomas Ross, of Gilmanton. Of this union one daughter, Mary A., was born. She is now (1882) a young lady and resides with her father. Mrs. Lougee died Aug. 8, 1865, and he married for his second wife Ellen, daughter of Hazen Wheeler, of Barnstead, N. H., Oct. 25, 1866. Their children are William W. and Arthur J.

JOHN D. STURTEVANT.

John D. Sturtevant was born in the town of Centre Harbor, Belknap Co., N. H. (old county name Strafford), July 4, 1816. His ancestry was of German extraction, and among the early settlers at Plymouth, Mass. His grandfather and five sons settled at Centre Harbor, N. H., from whom have descended all those who bear the name in and around Centre Harbor and many elsewhere. By occupation all were farmers. The children's names were Hosea, John, Benjamin, Joseph, and Perez, all of whom, except Perez, died at Centre Harbor with an average age of over eighty-five years.

Perez Sturtevant was born before the Revolutionary war, in about 1765-67, married Dorothy, daughter of Rev. Josiah Kimball, of Sandwich, N. H., where she was born about the year 1785, and died about 1847-48. Their children were Starret, Josiah, Hezekiah Field, Isaac, John D., Albert P., Rosetta, and Mary, all born at Centre Harbor, except Mary, and all married and had children. Rosetta married C. A. Giles, Mary married Moody Clarke.

Perez Sturtevant was a small farmer at Centre Harbor, N. H. Subsequently, in about 1824, he moved to Danville, Vt., where he remained some fifteen years, thence after the death of his wife he went to a place opposite Sterling, Ill., on Rock River, whither four of his sons had emigrated, viz., Starrett, Josiah, Isaac, and Hezekiah Field. He died at Sterling, being over eighty-five years of age.

J. W. Longee M.D.

John D. Sturtevant

John D. Sturtevant, the immediate subject of this sketch, attended the common school winters, working on the farm summers. At the age of sixteen he left home and went to Peacham, and employed with Noah Martin as an apprentice to learn the trade of cloth-dressing, as compensation for which he received four dollars a month for nine months, the remaining three months he attended school, boarding himself. The next year he received five dollars a month for nine months, going to school as before.

At the end of that time his employer, Mr. Martin, commenced to manufacture cloth, and employed John D. at a dollar a day, at which he remained for two years. Thence to Bath, N. H., and entered a woolen factory, owned by a Village Falls manufacturing company, and operated by — Witherell, agent. It was one of the largest factories then in the State running, having two sets of woolen machinery. There he remained three years at one dollar and twenty-five cents per day.

From there, in 1837, he went to Lowell, Mass., and employed with the Middlesex Manufacturing Company at one dollar and twenty-five cents per day. After six months he was made foreman of a room at two dollars a day, engaging for a year, but at the end of six months hard times coming on, stopping the mill, he voluntarily released his employers from the other six months. He then went to Glover, Vt., where he owned an interest in a clothing establishment. At the same time he leased a woolen mill at a dollar a day, at Peacham, Vt., which he was to have so long as he might wish. He bought wool cheap and ran it six months, when he sold out, clearing five hundred dollars, and all before he was twenty-one years old.

In the spring of 1838 he first visited New York City, and while there made arrangements to go to Petersburg, Va., to take charge of putting in machinery in a new woolen-mill, and took charge of the mill for six months, when he returned to Lowell, Mass., but finding business exceedingly dull was obliged to accept one dollar and twenty-five cents per day for labor, being employed in the Whitney Blanket Mills, where, at the expiration of six months, he was made superintendent, at a salary of one thousand dollars for two years, when the company sold out, he being the purchaser of one of the mills, when he immediately began business for himself as a woolen manufacturer. Some four years or so after, in April, 1846, he bought a one-half interest in the Gonic Manufacturing Company in Rochester, with N. D. Wetmore, and the first year cleared twenty thousand dollars. They then dissolved partnership, and Mr. Sturtevant organized the Norway Plains Company, owning one-third of the capital stock, and has ever since been its agent. It only contained one building, which might be considered good, being fifty by one hundred, four stories, and it was burned in 1866. They were rebuilt the same year; also built two large four-story buildings fifty by one hundred, and one of fifty by one hundred and four, besides many other buildings, such as engine-rooms, store-houses, dwellings, etc. He employs about these mills about five hundred workmen, the running expenses being over five hundred dollars daily, their annual sales amounting to over eight hundred thousand dollars, principally in woolen blankets from one dollar and a half to twenty dollars per pair.

These mills have twenty-nine sets of machinery. Besides this he has an interest in the Waubeck Company Mills at Milton, N. H.; in size one hundred and eight by fifty-four, four stories, and ten sets of machinery, superintended by B. G. Adams. Also owns an interest in Winthrop Mills Company, at Winthrop, Me., containing woolen-mill forty by one hundred and fifty, four stories, twelve sets of machinery, and a cotton-mill forty-eight by one hundred, four stories; also at Norwich, Conn., under the title of Cinton Mills Company; also woolen-mill at Norwich, one hundred by fifty, four stories high, and contains ten sets of machinery; also another fifty by one hundred and twenty, four stories, twelve sets of machinery. At East Lyme, Conn., a woolen-mill eighty by fifty, four stories, and containing six sets of machinery. At Sandy Hook, Conn., a woolen-mill eighty by forty, four stories, and containing four sets of machinery.

Mr. Sturtevant is a director in all the foregoing mills, and president of the Waubeck Company Mills, at Milton, of Winthrop Mill Company, at Winthrop, Norwich Woolen Mill, at Norwich, Niantic, at East Lyme, and Clinton, at Norwich. Mr. Sturtevant has ever been and is one of the most stirring and reliable men in the locality; for instance, for two years, 1879-80, he made his own sales in Boston, amounting to five hundred thousand dollars, and only lost one hundred and twenty-five dollars bad debts.

He was married, Oct. 16, 1841, to Adeline Bradley, daughter of Joshua and Dorcas (Jones) Bradley. She was born Dec. 30, 1819. Their children are Edwin A., who died at the age of twenty; Frances A., wife of Amasa Clarke, of Boston; Ellen B., wife of Edward Steese, of Boston. These latter have two children.—Edwin S. and Gertrude. In addition to his interest in woolen-mills, which is large, his unencumbered interest in real estate in New York City is equal in value about one million dollars. The towns in which his mills are located have all been greatly benefited by his enterprise. From the start his mills have never stopped on account of hard times, and he has never allowed a note to go to protest; help always paid once a month. During the forty years of his experience in the woolen manufacture more than seven-eighths of the woolen-mills in the United States have failed. Honesty, industry, and prompt business habits is the road to success. All his real estate operations in New York were made through his brother, A. P. Sturtevant, who was in real estate and building, and proved highly profitable to both. All his other brothers now living are wealthy farmers on Rock River, Ill.

EBENEZER G. WALLACE.

Ebenezer G. Wallace was born in Berwick, Me., Jan. 5, 1823. His father's side was of Scotch descent, and his mother's side of English descent. His father, Linzey Wallace, came to Berwick from Littleton, N. H., when about twenty-one years of age, a Methodist preacher, and married Abigail Gowell, who was Ebenezer's mother. She died when he was about three years old, so young that he has no recollection of her. His mother was heir to part of a large farm, and his parents made it their homestead. The farm, though large, was rather unproductive, making a great deal of hard work, and affording rather a poor living. His father was the magistrate for that section of country. There being no lawyer nearer than four miles, he wrote all the deeds and wills, and also married a great many couples; for these he received some compensation. As a preacher he was a local preacher, and was almost a slave to the surrounding country, having calls to attend most all the funerals for many miles around, not only in Berwick but in the adjoining towns, and in some cases going many miles to the funeral, and all without any pay. There is only one case remembered when he ever received anything, then a man gave him fifty cents, urging it upon him for preaching at his child's funeral.

When about seventeen years of age the subject of this sketch went to learn a trade at tanning and currying with Oliver Hill, who lived and carried on business in Berwick, about two miles from his home. One thing here in the boy goes to show the foundation for the future thrift of the man as developed through life. The labor to be performed through his apprenticeship was hard, the hours of labor long, one-half the year, through the long days, working till after sunset, the other half of the year working till nine o'clock at night. Above this task he worked extra hours, and worked holidays for pay, working every 4th of July during his apprenticeship, and accumulated and saved during the time over a hundred dollars. His pay for services during this time was only forty dollars per year besides his board. After getting through his apprenticeship and honorably discharged, he had a desire for a better education, having up to this time only had the advantages of common schools, but the district was very populous in children and the schools quite long. He and his brother Edwin went three years to school to Phillips'

Exeter Academy, and as they had nobody able to help them, supported themselves tanning calfskins, and other small stock in Capt. Fernald's tannery, a privilege granted by Capt. Fernald more as a favor to them than for the mere nominal rent which he received. They did the work on the stock mornings and evenings and days that the school did not keep and in vacations. Having to use nearly all their hours out of school to carry on their business made it pretty hard work in their class, but with all the load they had to carry they never went to recitation with a poor lesson; in fact, they were two of the few in their class who took the advanced position when the class had to be divided by Dr. Soule on account of a great difference of scholarship, Dr. Soule calling the part of the class left behind his "steer team." The stock in their business was bought with money, small loans obtained of a friend, and some stock bought on credit. They had through their boyhood days maintained a credit and good faith in payments much above boys in general. They had the confidence of those who knew them. When they commenced going to school at Exeter their intention was to go to college, but finding it so hard to meet the expenses, and also having a liking for business, they abandoned the idea of going to college.

After closing up at Exeter, Ebenezer G. went to Rochester, N. H., where he now lives, and there obtained a small chance to do some tanning in a tannery owned and occupied by Horne & Hall, taking a part of his time on his own stock, the rest of the time working for them by the day, and for James Badge, who owned another tannery in Rochester. In the fall and winter of 1848 and 1849 he, with another man named Boston, took a job finishing leather for John N. Furber, who had a small tannery in the adjoining town of Farmington. While working on this job, about the 1st of January, 1849, news began to come of the discovery of gold in California, and after reading the first report he said, "If this news is confirmed I am going to California." Every paper confirmed the report, and he got ready as soon as he could, and in the fore part of February joined the Bay State Company, a joint stock company being got up in Boston, requiring a contribution of three hundred dollars and a recommendation of good character. The company consisted of upwards of one hundred and forty members. The company was formed with the idea to all live together, work in common, and divide equally. They took out a meeting-house and a preacher, Rev. Mr. Hatch (Methodist). The company soon changed their minds about working and living in common, and broke up into small squads of about a dozen in a company before half-way there. After reaching California the company scattered over the mining sections of California in all directions, working in the original squads or dividing and subdividing, according to likes and dislikes. While in California he worked in the mines, generally in company with one other man. He was tolerably successful in mining for that kind of business, none making, during those years, large amounts in the mines. He kept informed in regard to the success of the members of the Bay State Company. When he left California about fifteen of the company had died. Some had done worse,—had become drunken sots,—not over half of those living had saved anything, and only one other member of the Bay State Company had saved as much as he had who had followed the pursuit of mining.

A few of the company had taken other business in the cities, and had made more than any had at mining. He arrived home from California in February, 1852, having been gone three years from the time of joining the company in Boston in February, 1849.

In May, 1853, he married Sarah E. Greenfield, of Rochester, N. H., and they went to Concord, N. H., and lived most one year, till he and his brother purchased the tannery of Warren & Richards, in Rochester, when they returned to Rochester and have lived there ever since. They have now living two sons, Albert and Sumner, and three daughters, Carrie Helen, Annie, and Emma Josie, having lost one son, Henry Ernest, the youngest, who died at about seventeen years of age. They give their children the best educational advantages. The two sons graduated at Dartmouth College. Their oldest daughter has just graduated at Linsell Seminary, Auburn-dale, Mass. Annie is in this school, and will graduate in 1883; and Emma Josie will probably take the same course when old enough. The subject of this sketch has very little ambition for political honors. He served two years, 1867 and 1868, in the Legislature, being both years on the Railroad Committee, and the second year chairman of Committee on Retrenchment and Reform. He had shown himself, during the first year, so urgent an economist that the Speaker, Gen. Griffin, when he made up the committees the second year, said to him, "I am going to put you on the Railroad Committee, and am going to make you chairman of the Committee on Retrenchment and Reform, but hope you will not tear everything to pieces."

He was a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1876.

EDWIN WALLACE.

Edwin Wallace was born, in 1823, in the town of Berwick, Me. Linsy Wallace, his father, came to Berwick as a Methodist preacher from Littleton, N. H. The father's side can be traced back three generations. The third generation back—the first that came over from the old country—first lived in Colrain, Mass., and afterwards moved from there to Franconia, N. H. Linsy Wallace's father went from Franconia to Littleton and settled, having several sons, of whom Linsy was the oldest. He remained at home till of age, having only the advantage of the common schools. He soon after going to Berwick became acquainted with and married Abigail Gowdell, and settled on a farm inherited by her from her father. Edwin's father and mother were both quite large, each weighing about two hundred pounds, and a very evenly mated pair. The father was a very social, genial man, and very much liked in the community where he lived and moved. The mother was also very social, and regarded a leader in society. She died, when about twenty five years old, of typhus fever that raged in that vicinity at that time. She belonged to a driving family, a family successful and thrifty beyond the average of people in that section.

The district school was all the educational advantages that the children could have at home, but this was quite good, the winter schools being quite long, and Edwin made good use of these, getting so far advanced that he had to stay at home and study, the teachers employed not being able to help him in the studies he was pursuing, and he so well improved his time that he passed an examination right from his town school, and taught a school in a neighboring district, boarding at home, and several of the older scholars, boys considerably older than he was, went to his school from his district, and one from another district, who was over twenty-one years of age, walking more than four miles each way from his home.

Edwin remained at home till he was of age, except six months; when he was sixteen years old he went to work for a neighbor for seven dollars per month, for six months, and saved all his wages except enough to buy a suit of clothes, and bought some sheep, buying a few of the best out of two flocks. This laid the foundation of one of the best flocks in the town.

After his brother had served out the time of his apprenticeship, they together concluded to have a better education, and had a desire to go to Phillips' Exeter Academy. They took their father's horse and sleigh, starting early in the morning; they drove to South Newmarket, and put their horse up to be fed and cared for, while they walked from there to Exeter and return. They first called to see Dr. Soule at his house, and from him got permission to enter the school the next term; then they saw Capt. Fernald, with the result given by E. G. After attending to the business at Exeter, they walked back to Newmarket and took their horse home, arriving home about ten o'clock in the evening in a blinding snow-storm.

After getting through at Exeter, where they had gone through a course for college, Edwin remained at home in the summer, teaching school in winter. He taught in his own town, North Berwick, Me., North Hampton and Rye, N. H. He received about thirty-five dollars per month, or about one dollar per day above expense of board, which was the highest price paid by these districts in those times.

While teaching school in Rye the gold discovery was made in California, and Edwin's brother, E. G., became very earnest to go, and came down to Rye to make some arrangement to sell out his effects in Rochester and elsewhere, so that he might go. Edwin very reluctantly consented to enter into the plan, but did so with intention of closing up the business as quick as it could be done to advantage. Closing the school as soon as could be done consistent with his engagement, he went to Rochester to enter upon his new duties. Having taken an inventory of stock and effects, he raised what was found to be capital above liability and paid it over to E. G., and commenced the management of the affairs to close them up.

The property consisted of various kinds of leather, and in several places of tan-yards, some in Rochester, some in Great Falls, and also hides put out to tan in Union village. The hides that were put out to tan were badly managed, and most of the leather nearly spoiled, so that it had to be sold for damaged inner-soling, which is the cheapest kind of leather. The times came on hard for the leather business, and the stock had to be sold very low, so that when the property was all closed out Edwin found himself five hundred dollars behind, or worse than nothing. This would have discouraged many young men just starting, with no one to help them, but it did not him. Having become considerably acquainted with the leather business, he continued on, both finishing and selling and buying and selling rough stock, so that in about one year and a half he had not only made up the amount he was behind, but had got worth three thousand dollars. He had been buying, giving his notes, and selling, and taking notes, doing business to considerable extent in this way, when by failures in Haverhill he lost all he was worth. Three thousand one hundred dollars failed on him at once. At this time parties that held notes against him came to him and advised to not attempt to pay in full, but settle off, paying about fifty per cent. These parties were ready to do this, and thought all would readily do it, but he said, "No, every man should be paid in full," remarking that he did not think this was the end of him in business matters. He paid every demand in full, and, although he was put to great trouble and disadvantage at this time, he so managed as not to have a note go to protest.

He finally made settlements with the failed parties, so that he realized about fifteen hundred dollars from the three thousand one hundred that failed.

He continued on in a small way buying and selling leather, and also employing one or two men finishing stock, till his brother returned from California. He was always closely devoted to his business, never seeking to be engaged in anything but business, nor much inclined to political life or political aspirations.

He was elected to the Legislature in 1870, and the next year to the Senate, being appointed on quite important committees, on several of which he was chairman.

His family consists of wife (daughter of Seneca Lander, of Woodstock, Me.), one son, and son's wife, and two daughters, having lost one daughter by his first wife, Susan R. Whitehouse, daughter of William Whitehouse, of Rochester, N. H. This daughter was married to H. D. Jacobs, and lived in Brooklyn, N. Y. The son is in the office of the shoe-shop.

Soon after E. G. returned home from California they formed the partnership of E. G. & E. Wallace. At first they bought leather in the rough in Boston, and finished it, selling to the shoe manufacturers, working themselves and hiring one or two men to work for them. After a while Warren & Richards, who had been carrying on business in the tannery now occupied by E. G. & E. Wallace, proposed to sell out the concern, and a trade was soon made with them for it. The establishment was quite small then, employing about six or eight men in all. The old shop they have had moved off out on the lot, and used for coarse storage. It is held in esteem by them to show what the beginning was at that time. It was not very encouraging to them to buy out a tannery and enter upon the business in this place, as nearly all that had engaged in the business in this section had failed or given up, not only at Rochester, but all down through Great Falls, Berwick, South Berwick, Salmon Falls, and Dover, only two out of a score or more remaining, and those since have fallen by the wayside. Of all that entered into the tanning business in and about this part of New Hampshire and Maine, only three concerns lived and made money. Those three were of the old type, and did business in the earlier olden times. These were Moses Hale, of Rochester; Nicholas Hanson, of South Berwick; and Nathaniel and Jeremiah Young, of Dover. So that the prospect was not flattering to buy out and run a tannery in this part of the country, and they contemplated going to Western New York or Pennsylvania to engage in the tanning business, but by dint of circumstances and the fact that Warren & Richards wished to sell out, and offered the tannery quite low, they settled down in the business here.

When they began, one worked in the curry-shop, taking charge of that, with two or three hired men; the other in the tannery, with about the same number of hands. From this time the business commenced to increase, and the old curry-shop became too small, and they were about to build a new one, when they heard of the old meeting-house for sale, which had been the old Farmington town-house. This they bought of Simon L. Hayes for one hundred and twenty-five dollars. This was taken down and put up as a currying-shop and shoe-shop, one-half being parted off into rooms for the manufacture of shoes, but never used for that purpose, and in a year or two more room was needed for finishing leather, and the partitions were taken out, and all put into leather-finishing room. Since that time the shop has had three quite large additions, and at this time is too small, and seems to require still another addition. Instead of six to eight hands, as were at first employed in the leather department, there are now about one hundred.

The shoe business had its beginning with them at a later period, and was entered into by them from force of circumstances. When the Rebellion broke out in 1861 they were largely tanning calf-skins, which they finished and sold to parties in the boot and shoe business. Sending the stock to Boston, they would meet their customers Wednesdays and Saturdays, and in this way sold from week to week their product, but the Rebellion failed nearly all their trade, so that they were not able to continue or so discouraged they did not care to do more, and thus they were left without buyers with a large stock of calf-skins on hand. They now had to turn their attention to find a market, and concluded they would have to manage to work up their stock. They went to see one who had been about the largest buyer of their goods, and proposed to him to go in company with them to use up their leather and share together the profit and loss. But he said he had had enough of the business, and did not wish to risk anything more, but said if they would run him steady for six months, he would lay aside what little stock he had and go to work for them, and a trade was made with the understanding that he should be furnished steady work for six months, but instead of six months he manufactured for them steadily for fifteen years, never being idle during the whole time, and is manufacturing now for Wallace, Elliott & Co., of New York, a house closely connected with their New Hampshire shoe business. The manufacturer of boots often had to store quite largely, and one time hired a small barn in his town and filled it with goods.

Soon after beginning the boot business they concluded to make a few shoes in their own town. A shop was standing idle, built by two men intending to use it themselves for the shoe business, but they did not conclude to venture in, and after it stood a year or two it was hired by them and the shoe business started. It was not expected to make over twenty or twenty-five cases of shoes per week, to use up a class of stock that was not so ready sale with them as other kinds. At the commencement of this shoe business in Rochester they engaged the services of Lafayette Wiggin, known as "Gen. Wiggin," he having had quite an extensive experience in the manufacture of shoes, and this same Gen. Wiggin is with them to-day, as well and rugged as he was the day he commenced. He ships the goods and handles about all the money that goes through the whole business,—a valuable man for the place.

This establishment in all its parts, beginning with six or eight men, now have in all departments nearly seven hundred employes, paying out as wages twenty thousand dollars per month, or from two hundred and twenty-five to two hundred and fifty thousand dollars per year.

Besides their business in Rochester, they have large associated interests in other places. Besides the New York house of Wallace, Elliott & Co., of which they are senior partners, they have large interests with four leather houses in Boston, and besides investments in corporations in various parts of the country.

REV. EZEKIEL TRUE.

Rev. Ezekiel True traces his ancestry back seven generations, to Henry True, the first settler of Trues in America, whose wife was Israel Pike, daughter of Capt. Robert Pike, of Salem, Mass. He came from England in what year is not known. He died in Salem. They had two sons,—Henry and Joseph.

Capt. Henry was born in Salem, March 18, 1644—45. He married Jane Bradbury in 1667—68. He died Sept. 8, 1735. They had four children,—William True, Ensign Henry True, Deacon John True, and Deacon Jabez True. Deacon John was born Feb. 23, 1678, was married to Martha Morrell, Jan. 16, 1702. They had five children,—Jacob, Ezekiel, Daniel, Moses, and Thomas.

Ezekiel, whose wife was Mary Morrell, settled at Salisbury Plain, Mass. They had ten children,—Sarah, Jacob, Lydia, Martha, Ezekiel and Mary (twins), Jabez, Dr. John, William, and Paul. Jacob was born April 6, 1748, was married to Lydia Dow March 20, 1773, died Sept. 2, 1826. He settled at Salisbury, N. H. They had six children,—Daniel, Polly, Jacob, Ezekiel, Lydia, and Dr. John.

Ezekiel, the father of the subject of this sketch, was born at Salisbury, N. H., Feb. 6, 1780. Married Nancy Nutting, of Corinth, Vt., and settled in that town, her father being one of its first settlers. They had eight children,—Hiram, Jacob, John, Lydia Ann, Ezekiel, Emily B., Polly, and Annette W. Ezekiel was born June 5, 1814, in Corinth, Vt. (Henry True<sup>1</sup>, Capt. Henry<sup>2</sup>, Deacon John<sup>3</sup>, Ezekiel<sup>4</sup>, Jacob<sup>5</sup>, Ezekiel<sup>6</sup>, Ezekiel, the subject of this note, the 7th). His parents were pious, respectable people, but were in moderate circumstances, yet always provided a comfortable living for their family. His father owned a farm, and by trade was a house-carpenter. After his boys became large enough to work, they carried on the farm chiefly, while he worked at his trade. He died in August, 1838. Ezekiel and Annette W. (Mrs. Glidden, of Manchester, N. H.) are the only members of the family now living.

Ezekiel did not take to farming with great enthusiasm. The implements then in use being very heavy and clumsy, he often became very tired, and in the afternoon it often seemed to him that the sun went very slowly down.

He had a strong liking for books and study, and not infrequently played truant from the workfield, and would be found one mile away in the school-room, or hid away in his father's attic, studying his arithmetic, grammar, and geography with the view of becoming a teacher. From the time he was twelve years old it was his intense purpose to obtain an education sufficient to teach a common school, and although his school privileges were limited to but little more than two months in a year, yet by dint of application, when seventeen years of age, he passed an examination before the superintending school committee of his town, and received a certificate of his qualifications to teach the branches of education usually taught in common schools. He engaged to teach a school for two months, at eight dollars per month and boarding. He went through with his school with commendable success.

After this, till he was twenty-one years old, he spent his springs and summers at home on the farm, attending the academy at Bradford, Vt., in the autumns, teaching in the winters.

One of the most severe trials of his life occurred when he was about nine years of age. He being passionately fond of books, his friends had made him presents of quite a number suited to children, which he very highly prized. One day a little sister two years old found them and tore them all in pieces, not one survived the wreck. He wept many bitter tears, but they were gone forever, and to this day he thinks of the event with sadness of heart, and although since that time has met with losses of much greater value, but all put together did not produce such real grief as the destruction of those precious little books.

When very young his mind was very much exercised upon the subject of religion; the thoughts of dying often awakened inexpressible anxieties in his young mind, and gave him many sleepless hours in the silent watches of the night. In April, 1828, he publicly expressed his desire to become a Christian, and soon afterwards experienced emancipating grace. On the 20th of March, 1830, he was baptized by the late Rev. Nathaniel Bowles, and united with the first Free-Will Baptist Church in Corinth.

He soon felt that the work of the gospel ministry must be his life-work; but a sense of unworthiness and unfitness seemed impassable barriers, which could not be possibly overcome. But at the age of twenty-one years, feeling that necessity was laid upon him and that woe was unto him if he refused, he resolved to use the ability given him in endeavoring to persuade men to become reconciled to God. Accordingly, on the 5th day of July, 1835, he made his first effort, taking for his text, "For what is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul, or life," or, "what shall a man give in exchange for his soul, or life," Matt. xvi. 26.

The congregation was large, and he being very diffident was much embarrassed, but having put his hand to the plow, he felt that there must be no looking back, he resolved to go forward, and was surprised to find his efforts so well appreciated. During the summer and autumn he received frequent invitations to supply the pulpit in his native town and also in several adjoining towns. He continued to work on the farm during the week and improve his gift on the Sabbath until the 20th of December, when he gave himself more fully to the work, and decided to spend the winter in the northern part of Vermont and in Conaecty, but how to accomplish it was with him a serious question, he having neither horse, sleigh or harness, and no means to purchase; but this difficulty was soon overcome. He went to a saw-mill and purchased a pair of sled-runners of bird's-eye maple, well seasoned and very hard wood, for which he paid fifty cents. With these he and his brother John manufactured a sleigh of a very unique pattern, minus of nearly all iron work. For a harness, he repaired one, which his father had lain by as useless many years before, but he fitted it up with very little expense, so that it answered his purpose very well indeed. His brother John furnished him with a horse, saying to him, "Take my horse; use him well; wear him out, and I will give you another, for you will never be worth a horse;" but as he had abandoned the idea of ever possessing much of this world's goods it did not very much depress or discourage him.

With this outfit he left his home, and traveled and held meetings during the winter with no very marked success. He returned home in the spring. Feeling very much the need of a better education to fit him for his work, he decided to spend some time in going to school. He chose to go to "North Parsonfield Seminary," Maine, the first and only academy then existing in his denomination.

His father gave him twenty dollars to assist him, all he could afford to at that time. With this aid, and by teaching, he succeeded in obtaining a common academical education. When he left school he went to Cornish, Me., and commenced holding meetings, which were attended with very precious results. There were between sixty or seventy conversions in this and the adjoining town of Limington. It was during this revival that it was thought that the interest of the cause demanded his ordination. He chose to return to his native town in Vermont, and receive ordination there. Accordingly, on the 22d of June, 1837, he, with two other young brethren, Rev. A. D. Smith, now living at Canterbury, N. H., and Rev. Gilman Sanborn, now deceased, all members of the same church, and nearly of the same age, were publicly set apart to the work of the gospel ministry. He then returned to Cornish, and baptized most of the converts.

In January, 1838, he accepted a call to become the pastor of the Free-Will Baptist Church in Portsmouth, N. H. This relation continued about three years. These were years of prosperity, there being about one hundred persons added by baptism to the church. In connection with his labors with his own church, he was employed as a city missionary for nearly two years of the time of his residence there.

In November, 1839, he was married to Miss Sylvia M. Hobbs, of Wells, Me., a very estimable lady, whose natural abilities, educational attainments, and whose rare gifts of exhortation, prayer, and song well fitted her to be an efficient helper to him in the gospel, she often visiting the sick and praying with them, and speaking words of comfort and encouragement to all, and her sallies of pleasantry and conversational ability made her presence more than welcome in all social gatherings. By her prudent management in her household affairs she greatly aided him in laying by some means to meet their future necessities. She died in Rochester, N. H., April 30, 1881, after a very painful sickness of more than seven years, which she very patiently endured.

From the commencement of his first pastorate in Portsmouth, in 1838, to 1873 he was not without an engagement a single Sabbath.

He labored as pastor with the following churches: Portsmouth, N. H., Wells, Me., Ashland, N. H., South Berwick, Me., Pittsfield, N. H., Lake village, N. H., Alton, N. H., Gilford, N. H., Farmington, N. H., Saco, Me., and Rochester, N. H.

All these churches enjoyed some prosperity during his pastorate, and several of them were favored with precious revivals and many additions made to their numbers.

He founded the Rochester Village Free-Will Baptist Church. He engaged a hall, and commenced holding meetings on the 2d day of April, 1871, and on the 31st of October following the church was organized and he chosen its pastor, which relation existed some more than four years.

The church increased in numbers and influence under his ministry.

He is now (1882) pastor of a small church about three miles from Rochester village, and is expected to preach to them every Sabbath. His genial, social disposition has won for him many friends wherever he has resided. He has served as one of the superintending school committee in most of the towns in which he has lived.

He has preached not less than four thousand five hundred sermons, attended about five hundred funerals, solemnized three hundred and fifty marriages, and baptized about three hundred persons.

He owns a residence in the pleasant village of Rochester, N. H., where he now resides in the enjoyment of good health and the fair prospect of a verdant old age, highly esteemed as a citizen and respected by all classes in the community.

CHARLES K. CHASE.

Charles K. Chase, youngest son of Simon Chase, was born in Rochester, N. H., May 17, 1809. Rev. John Chase, grandfather of Simon, was a settled minister at Spruce Creek, Kittery, Me., and had four sons,—Josiah, John, Thomas, and Bradstreet. Josiah settled at York, Me., Thomas and Bradstreet remained on the old homestead, and John married Harriet Dennett, of Kittery, and moved to Berwick, Me., which at that time was a wilderness. He had six sons and two daughters, namely: Sally, Betsey, Thomas, John, Josiah, Simon, Mark, and Abraham.

Thomas and John remained at home, Josiah settled at Limington, Mark at Newfield, Me., and Simon at the age of thirteen was bound out to Reuben Tabor, a hatter, and remained with him four years. He then went to Portsmouth and worked with a Mr. Kelly as a journeyman hatter. He then went to Berwick Academy in the winter of 1805, and in the spring of 1806 went to Rochester, recommended to Joseph Hanson by Joshua Meader, and entered Hanson's store as clerk, receiving ninety-six dollars the first year. He remained with him four years and then went to Milton, N. H., in 1810, and went into business for himself.

Simon Chase was born Sept. 30, 1786, and married Sarah Wingate, daughter of Enoch Wingate, of Milton, Oct. 28, 1813. He moved to Rochester in 1822, and went into business in company with Jonathan Torr. In 1825 he bought out Torr's interest in the business, and built a new brick store. The same year he bought the house on Central Square which was his home till his death, which occurred Jan. 31, 1877. His wife died June 14, 1870. Together with Charles Dennett and James Cole, he was instrumental in building the first Methodist Church in Rochester, of which he was an active member. He had ten children,—Betsey, E. Wingate, George W., John D., Mary Y., Harriet L., Charles K., Sarah F., Maria Josephine, and one who died in infancy. Charles at the age of seventeen left Warren Academy, at Woburn, Mass., and entered his father's store as clerk. At the end of four years he bought the store and business of his father.

In April, 1855, he married Ellen M. Burleigh, youngest daughter of John and Phebe Burleigh, of Sandwich, N. H. He had five children, viz.: Charles S., Grace M. J., Nellie and Jessie, who died in infancy, and Harry W.

Dec. 26, 1876, he married Abbie McD. Whitehouse, daughter of John McDuffee (banker), and had two children, Sarah McD. and Maud H.

During the first year of the war he was elected as one of a committee to pay out the funds due the families of soldiers who had enlisted in the service of the United States. He took a decided and unflinching stand for temperance, rum-shops and rum-drinking having increased to an alarming extent as one of the results of the war. He was appointed one of a committee of five by the town to prosecute all violations of the prohibitory law. The other members of the committee were Franklin McDuffee, cashier of Rochester bank; J. Frank Place, editor of the Courier; Charles W. Brown, merchant; and Robert McIlroy, superintendent of the Norway Manufacturing Company. They were in a great measure successful in their work, as all the liquor saloons in town were closed, which credit was not due to the committee alone, but to the temperance part of the community, backed by the strong arm of the law and the sympathy of the court, especially Joshua G. Hall, county solicitor, and Judge Doe. They were threatened many times with violence. Chase's store was damaged one Saturday night by being fired into with a gun in the hands of some person employed to do it, shot going the length of the store, but it did not take fire, as it was supposed was their intention. A reward of two hundred dollars was offered by the selectmen of the town for the conviction of the person who did it, but without success. The friends of temperance made up the loss to Mr. Chase. At the call of the first State temperance convention Mr. Chase was present in sympathy with the movement, believing in the ballot-box as well as the law to suppress the evil. He voted with that party as long as it existed.

In August, 1878, the old brick store built by his father was fired by an incendiary and destroyed with its contents. The loss to Mr. Chase was very heavy, but he was not discouraged. As soon as possible the ruins were cleared away. Oct. 1, 1878, the foundation was laid for a fine new block. The work was pushed rapidly, and the new store was completed and opened with a new stock of dry-goods April 29, 1879.

CHARLES GREENFIELD.

Charles Greenfield, son of John and Phebe Greenfield, was born in the town of Rochester, N. H., Feb. 18, 1826. His father, John Greenfield, was the eldest son of Simon Torr and Sarah Ham, and was born in 1781, in Rochester, on the old Torr farm. (See biography of John F. Torr, Rochester, N. H.) His name was changed by the Legislature to John Greenfield because he was in trade in Rochester, and soon after he began business his brother, Jonathan Torr, opened merchandising in the same place, and their goods would get badly mixed; hence to avoid this difficulty he had his name changed.

John Greenfield was reared as a tanner, shoemaker, and farmer, and very early showed signs of great foresight. Soon after he attained his majority, about 1812 to 1813, he commenced merchandising in Rochester, and for nearly or quite fifty years was one of the most successful business men in town. He was full of energy, and possessing a sound judgment was always able to make good investments. He was somewhat advanced in years before he married. He had four children, viz.: Charles, Sarah E. (wife of E. G. Wallace, of Rochester), Ella G. (Mrs. Daniel J. Parsons), and George, who married Mary F., daughter of John Parsley, of Strafford, and had five children. George died September, 1871.

John Greenfield died at seventy-five years of age, Jan. 13, 1863, leaving his family an ample fortune and, what is much better, a good name. Some of his children are among the most highly-educated people of Rochester, and all are good, worthy citizens. Charles Greenfield received a common-school and academic education till he was fourteen, when he commenced farming, which has been his principal employment since. Upon the death of his father in 1863 he received his proportion of his father's estate, and this has accumulated till now (1882) he is considered one of the wealthy men of the town. He possesses quick perception, clear judgment, and sound reason. He has seldom or ever made a financial mistake, and his word is as good as his bond. He owns several hundred acres in Rochester, and though a farmer nominally, yet he makes his money otherwise. In politics he is a Republican. He is a director of the Rochester National Bank, of which John McDuffee is now (1882) president, trustee in the Norway Plains Savings-Bank, and stockholder in various railroad and manufacturing interests. He married Arelina B., daughter of Gershom and Sally P. Downs, of Rochester, July 5, 1846. She was born May 17, 1826, in Rochester. Their children are Millie A. (wife of Horace L. Worcester, a newsdealer in Rochester), John, at present high sheriff of the county and a farmer by occupation; Ella S. (Mrs. Justin M. Leavitt, of Baxton, Me.; he is a mail-agent), Sarah E., Hattie A., and Frank, a newsdealer with his brother-in-law, Mr. Worcester, in Rochester. Mrs. Greenfield is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Mr. Greenfield is very reticent in all matters, modest, not given to show or ostentation, intelligent, and economical. He commands the esteem of all and the love of many.

JOHN F. TORR.

John F. Torr, one of the wealthiest farmers in Rochester, or Strafford County, is a lineal descendant from one Vincent Torr, who came from England when a young man, and settled in the town of Dover, N. H., on the farm which has been in the name ever since, and is now (1882) owned by Simon J. Torr.

Vincent had children, one of whom was Simon Torr, who married Sarah Ham, and had seven children, viz.: Betsey, Polly, Abigail, Sarah, John, Simon, and Jonathan H., all of whom were born on the old Torr homestead in Rochester, where John F. Torr, the immediate subject of our sketch, resides.

Simon Torr settled in Rochester about 1775 on the same farm which has been in the family ever since, or more than one hundred years. A part of the old house then built is still standing, and the same old wooden clock which was put in place by this venerable sire about the time he settled there is still marking accurately the time of day. The faces of four generations have looked upon this old clock, and it bids fair to keep time for many generations more.

John F. Ross

Charles Jennett

Simon Torr was a man of great energy and force of character. He was a tanner and farmer by occupation, and was successful in all his business enterprises. He died at about seventy-two years of age, his wife surviving him.

Simon Torr, son of Simon Torr, was born Oct. 5, 1789, in Rochester, and died Feb. 17, 1858. He married Betsey Davis, daughter of Thomas Davis, and had four children, viz.: Charles, deceased at sixteen; Simon A., who died at nine; John F., born April 8, 1829; and Sarah E., wife of Lewis E. Hanson. She died at twenty-six, leaving children.

Simon Torr (2d) was a farmer and tanner by occupation, a Whig in politics. His wife died Nov. 6, 1854, having been born Sept. 11, 1794.

John F. Torr, whose portrait accompanies this sketch, received very limited advantages for an education. As he is the only child of his parents who lived to survive them, he received the homestead in 1858, and has continued on it till now (1882). He is a man of most wonderful energy and force of character, having inherited many of the virtues of his ancestors. He is respected wherever known, and is justly considered one of the most intelligent and substantial men of his native town. He married Mary C. Downs, March 17, 1868. She was born Jan. 14, 1840, in Farmington, N. H. Their children are Charles C., Simon A., and George A. He is a Republican in politics, and though he has been selectman of his town, he neither seeks nor desires official positions.

CHARLES DENNETT.

Charles Dennett was born in Barnstead, N. H., Sept. 28, 1788, and died March 4, 1867.

He was a cabinet-maker originally, and came to Rochester in 1812 to work at that business, which he continued until about forty-one or two years of age; then became deputy sheriff, which office he filled for eighteen years. He was town clerk and county treasurer for some years, and was in the Legislature also. He did much in the way of surveying land and settling up estates, making wills, deeds, etc.

He was very prominent in the temperance cause, and spared neither time nor money in his efforts in that direction. In short, he was unusually public-spirited, and was active in everything that might conduce to the public good. He was one of the principal movers in establishing the Methodist Church in town, and always did all in his power to aid it in every way. He was active as a Freemason and Odd-Fellow also.

He had much mechanical ingenuity, and many years ago invented a lock, which was long used upon the bank, and defied repeated efforts of burglars. He also invented a corn-sheller, which did its work very successfully, shelling a bushel of corn in three minutes, separating corn and cobs.

He had so much versatility of talent that he usually succeeded in whatever he attempted, and was wholly a self-made man, his early advantages being very limited, but he was very observing, fond of reading, and interested in all modern progress and discoveries, and by the strictest honesty and most upright probity of character won the esteem of all right-minded people, though, of course, he made enemies by his temperance zeal and straightforward course.

JEREMIAH D. RICHARDSON.

Jeremiah D. Richardson, son of Thomas and Nancy (Odiore) Richardson, was born in the town of Rochester, N. H., Sept. 19, 1809. The line of descent as far as known is as follows: Jeremiah D., Thomas, John, and William. The writer is unable to trace the line of descent further back. The ancestors were a hard-working, God-fearing people as a whole. Thomas had three children, viz.: Jeremiah D., Caroline (deceased), and Mary Ann (deceased). He was a Democrat in politics. He was a brickmaker by trade, also a shoemaker and farmer. Naturally he was a fine man, and possessed good judgment and a noble spirit, but drink caused his downfall, and he died in 1834. His wife died Dec. 30, 1859, and both lie buried side by side in the Hayes burying-ground. Mrs. Thomas Richardson was a member of the Congregational Church, was a good and true wife and mother, and left the fragrance of a good name to her children.

Jeremiah D. Richardson remained at home working, as most boys in those days did, on the farm summers and attending the district school winters till he was fourteen years of age. He worked on the farm and in the shop till he was twenty. At twenty-one he worked for one Moses Young six and a half months, at seven dollars and fifty cents per month. In 1832 he worked for Mr. Woodman, in Rochester, and the following winter in the harness business for Peter Folsom. Soon after he made a trip to Roxbury, Mass., and was gone six months, when he returned home to take care of his parents, which he did till their death. He has spent some fifteen years with the Wallace Brothers, of Rochester, N. H. He owns a farm of some eighty acres in Rochester, and in all his dealings with men he has not lost their confidence. He has met with more than average success, especially when we consider the disadvantages under which he has had to labor. Politically he was formerly a Democrat, but upon the organization of the Republican party he joined it. He has been twice married,—first, to Martha, daughter of John Place, by whom he has had two children, viz.: Caroline, who married Edward C. Hurd, a farmer in Rochester; George A., who died at fourteen. Mrs. Richardson died October, 1848, and he married for his second wife, March 11, 1849, Mary C., daughter of Moses and Elizabeth Hopkinson, of Buxton, Me. She was born April 9, 1822. Their children are M. Barbury, born June 20, 1851; Charles T., born Nov. 22, 1853; Louis M., born April 18, 1860; and J. Sherman, born Aug. 2, 1865. Mr. and Mrs. Richardson are members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which he has held some offices.

OSMAN B. WARREN.

The subject of this sketch was born in Rochester, N. H., and son of Rev. James and Lydia (Perkins) Warren, and grandson of Daniel and Sally Warren.

Daniel was born Dec. 12, 1768, and died in Rochester, Dec. 12, 1844, aged seventy-six years. Sally was born July 15, 1767, and died in Rochester, May 15, 1857, aged eighty-nine years and ten months. Their family consisted of Joseph, James, Mary, Hannah, and Emily.

James, the father of Osman, was born in Lebanon, Me., March 13, 1802, and died in Rochester, Feb. 5, 1880, aged seventy-eight. Lydia, the mother, was born in Sanford, Me., Nov. 12, 1812, and died in Rochester, Dec. 18, 1875, aged sixty-three years. Their family consisted of Horatio H., Arcthusa K., Melvin M., Sarah F., Osman B., and Wilbur F. (Melvin and Sarah died in infancy).

Horatio H. was born in Paris, Me., May 9, 1837. Enlisted Aug. 5, 1862, in the Thirteenth Regiment, Company B, New Hampshire Volunteers, for three years; was sergeant of his company two years. Engaged in eleven battles, and severely wounded at Cold Harbor, Va., June 3, 1864.

Wilbur F. was born in Rochester, Oct. 28, 1848. Enlisted in Company C, First New Hampshire Cavalry, and served till July, 1865; was sergeant of his company at the time of his discharge, and was connected with Sheridan's command through all his term of service; was representative in the session of 1881-82.

Osman B. was born Sept. 15, 1845, and of his history prior to the war of the Rebellion we can say nothing more than of school-boys generally. Fired with the patriotism which characterized many of the citizens of his native town, he enlisted Aug. 1, 1862, at the age of seventeen, in Company H, Ninth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers. Promoted to first sergeant on arriving at the seat of war; was engaged in the battles of South Mountain and Antietam, in Maryland, after which was in the battles of Fredericksburg, Sulphur Springs, and Wheatland, Va. His company was then sent with the Ninth Corps, under Sherman, to assist Gen. Grant at Vicksburg. While there they had an engagement with Johnston's army at Big Black River and at Jackson, Miss. The Ninth Corps then returned to Virginia, and he was engaged in Grant's three days' fight at the Wilderness and Spottsylvania Court-House; at the latter place was captured by the rebels, May 12, 1864, and taken to Andersonville prison, Georgia, arriving May 29, and received the hospitable fare and treatment of Capt. Wertz (whose name is sufficient to tell more of the sufferings of the prisoners than whole pages of biography could do) for four and a half months. Sherman's march to the sea caused the rebels to break up this prison, and he was carried first to Charleston, S. C., and from there to Florence, N. C., and there kept until Feb. 29, 1865, when, with the other prisoners, he was paroled, as the rebels had got nearly surrounded by the Union forces. After the capture of Mr. Warren, news came to his home that he was killed in the engagement at the court-house, and our local paper had an obituary notice in its columns. On arriving at his home he presented such an emaciated appearance that many thought the notice had better stand in the paper as a fact, and not call it a mistake. The war having closed, and Mr. Warren having recruited his health, engaged in the service of the Messrs. Wallace, and continued in their employ until April, 1878, when he retired to take charge of the post-office, having been appointed to that position March 25th, by President Hayes, and again reappointed, April 18, 1882, by President Arthur. He was twice honored with a seat in the Legislature by the suffrage of his fellow-citizens, serving as representative in the sessions of 1875 and 1876, and was placed each year on the Committee of Military Affairs. He was commander of Sampson Post, No. 22, G. A. R., for three years.

Mr. Warren was married, April 20, 1870, to Luella J., daughter of Ephraim H. and Jane Brown, of Norway, Me., and have children as follows: Frank S., Fannie C., and Alice, who died in infancy. Mr. Warren is now (June, 1882) thirty-seven years old, and for one of his age has seen as many of the vicissitudes of life as naturally fall to a man in a lifetime.

CHAPTER CXL

DOVER.

The Settlement of Edward Hilton.—The Rev. William Hubbard, in his "History of New England," says,—

"Some merchants and other gentlemen in the west of England, belonging to the cities of Exeter, Bristol, Shrewsbury, and towns of Plymouth, Dorchester, etc., . . . having obtained patents for several parts of the country of New England, . . . made some attempts of beginning a plantation in some place about the Pascataqua River about the year 1623. . . . They sent over that year one Mr. David Thompson, with Mr. Edward Hilton and his brother, Mr. William

J. D. RICHARDSON.

O. B. Warren

Hilton, who had been fishmongers in London, with some others that came along with them, furnished with necessaries for carrying on a plantation there. Possibly some others might be sent after them in the years following, 1624 and 1625, some of whom first, in probability, seized on a place called the Little Harbour, on the west side of Pascataqua River, towards or at the mouth thereof; the Hiltons in the mean while setting up their stages higher up the river towards the northwest, at or about a place since called Dover."

The information thus given would seem to be decisive that the settlements in Dover and in the present town of Rye were in the same year and under similar auspices. The historian himself says that he availed himself, in writing his history, of the memory of the ancient settlers. He was a graduate of Harvard in 1642, and was settled as minister in Ipswich in 1658, while the original settler, Edward Hilton, was still living near Exeter, not a day's journey distant. His standing was such that he was once temporary president of Harvard College.

Some doubts have lately been cast, nevertheless, upon the date of the settlement of Dover. It is needless to revive them, inasmuch as an original paper recently found in the Suffolk Court files is decisive. It is a petition of a nephew of Edward Hilton, and son of William Hilton, in 1660, for a confirmation of a sale of lands made in 1626 by Tahanto, saganamore of Penecooke, to William Hilton, Sr., and his son, this petitioner. In this petition he says,—

"Whereas your petitioners father William Hilton came over into New England about the yeare Anno Dom: 1621 & yo<sup>r</sup> petitioner came about one yeare and an halfe after, and in a little tyme following settld ourselues vpon the River of Paschataq. with Mr Edw: Hilton, who were the first English planters there."

The William Hilton, Jr., making this application was a person of standing and character, and his incidental testimony is conclusive. The senior William Hilton came over to Plymouth in the "Fortune," Nov. 11, 1621. His wife and two children followed in the "Anne," July or August, 1623. This agrees with the "about a yeare & an halfe after" given above. The settlement of Dover is thus seen to be as declared by Hubbard.

This colonization required courage, energy, and self-denial. It is true it was not an unknown coast. On the 10th of April, 1603, under the patronage of merchants of Bristol, Martin Pring left that port with two vessels, one of fifty tons, the other of twenty-six. In his explorations of our coast he entered the Pascataqua. He rowed up ten or twelve miles, the first European who ever saw the woods of Dover. "Very goodly groves and woods," his narrative says he found on the shores of our rivers, "and sundry sorts of beasts;" but he left it to its silence. On the 3d of March, 1614, Capt. John Smith sailed from London. On the 30th of April he reached Monhegan. There he built seven boats. In one of these boats, with eight men, he explored the coast and entered the Pascataqua. Probable it also seems that John Mason, while plantation governor in Newfoundland, also explored our shores, and thus personally learned of the advantages of the place which he chose for colonization.

Nor is it unlikely that fishermen who touched at the Isles of Shoals had sometimes found a harbor in the safe inlet of the mainland.

But in that spring of 1623, from Plymouth harbor to the Pascataqua, there is no substantial evidence of the residence of a single European; and from Pascataqua eastward there was nothing save temporary visiting places of fishermen till one reached the French settlement at Mount Desert. Inland were the savage tribes, beginning at the very harbor, and peopling the unknown forests. Along the coasts were often ships of other nations, or vessels whose easy allegiance made them no desirable visitors. The neighbors of the Pascataqua settlers for some years to come were to be the fishermen who might land upon the Isles of Shoals.

Of Edward Hilton, who most of all men deserves to be considered as the father of New Hampshire, as he certainly was its first permanent settler, we have but one item on English soil. The very defective records of the Fishmongers' Guild, in London, show that he was admitted to that wealthy fraternity in 1621. Much research has thus far failed to find the place of his birth. It is not improbable that he was a remote descendant of the old baronial family of the name of Hilton, but no connection is known. He was certainly a man of some property at the time of his emigration, and his character during his whole life was that of a gentleman.

Who were his associates and emigrants, beyond his brother and nephew, no record tells us. His associates in England, not the emigrants but the projectors, were merchants of Plymouth and other towns of the west of England. Probably his few men, and certainly the emigrants who followed a few years later, were of that hardy stock, particularly of Devonshire, which gave to the ocean such men as Gilbert, Drake, Hawkins, and Raleigh, and contributed so essentially to the glory of the reign of Elizabeth.

So vague is the knowledge of the men, the vessel, the date of departure from England, and the anchorage in the river. The emigrants have left us no records of these things. Plymouth had its Bradford and its Winslow. Massachusetts Bay had its Winthrop. The records of their beginnings are minute. But Plymouth was the refuge of Pilgrims whose consciences enforced their separation from the Church of England. Massachusetts Bay was the refuge of Puritans whose consciences scrupled at some of the ceremonies, but not at the existence, of the national church. Each of these had the histories of peculiar ideas to write. The New Hampshire colonists, neither Pilgrims nor Puritans, satisfied with both the existence and the ceremonies of the Established Church, came here as bold and hardy pioneers in commercial enterprise, whose number of beaver-skins bought of the Indians, or of fish cured for the English market, had none of the romance to attract a historian. Only one other single item as to this settlement is found in history for half a dozen years. It is when Mr. Hilton, in 1628, paid one pound of the expenses incurred in breaking up the obnoxious settlement of Morton at Wollaston, the entire cost being twelve pounds and seven shillings, and Plymouth colony at Pascataqua, each paying two pounds ten shillings.

"These settlements," says the historian, "went on but slowly for seven years, and in 1631 . . . there were but three houses in all that part of the country adjoining the Pascataqua River. There had been also some expense about salt-works."

The spot of the first settlement is given by tradition, and the tradition seems probable. It was at the extreme southern point of Dover. The dwellers on the beautiful plateau, a summer resort, dwell upon its site. The view southward is across the broad, deep, and rapid Pascataqua, which flows from Great Bay; westward it is over the Bellamy River and fertile meadow lands beyond; eastward it is across the New-felchawanoek, which now separates Maine from New Hampshire, and to the Eliot fields and Agamenticus. Later emigrants built their houses upwards on the commanding slopes whose banks are washed by the salt tides of the two rivers. But the beginnings were limited to the southern extremity of the Point. Here the settlers "set up their stages," and on the land arrayed their flakes. The great river at proper seasons was richly supplied with fish. Even in the boyhood of old men known to the writer in his boyhood there was no scarcity of this source of wealth.

Edward Hilton and his associates in England desired some specific title or enlargement of title to lands. These titles were given by an organization usually known as the "Plymouth Council," which had received letters patent from the king, Nov. 3, 1606, and whose lands purported to extend from the fortieth to the forty-eighth degree of north latitude, and from sea to sea. From this body, which had made many grants along the coast, was made one to Edward Hilton and associates, March 12, 1629-30,—that is, March 12, 1630, in modern usage. This grant recites as follows:

"Now know ye that the said President and Councill by Virtue & Authority of his Majties said Letters Patents, and for and in consideration that Edward Hilton & his Associates hath already at his and their owne proper costs and charges transported sundry servants to plant in New England aforesaid at a place there called by the natives Wecamaohunt otherwise Hiltons point lying some two leagues from the mouth of the River Pascataqua in New England aforesaid where they have already Built some houses, and planted Corne, And for that he doth further intend by Gods Divine Assistance, to transport thither more people and cattle, to the good increase and advancement & for the better settling and strengthening of their plantacon as also that they may be the better encouraged to proceed In soe plons a work which may Especially tend to the propagation of Religion and to the Great increase of Trade to his Majties Realms and Dominions, and the advancement of publike plantacon, Have given granted Enfeofold and Confirmed, and by this their present writing doe fully clearly and absolutely give grant enfeofold and Confirme unto the said Edward Hilton his heires and Assignes for ever, all that part of the River Pascataque called or known by the name of Wecamaohunt or Hiltons point with the south side of the said River, up to the flull of the River, and three miles unto the Maine Land by all the breadth aforesaid. Together with all the Shoares Creeks Bays Harbors and Coasts, alongst the sea within the Limits and Bounds aforesaid with the woods and Islands next adjoining to the said Lands, not being already granted by the said Councill unto any other person or persons together alone with all the Lands Rivers Mines minerals of what kinde or nature soever, woods Quarries, Marshes, Waters, Lakes, Fishings, Huntings, Hawkings, fowlings, Comodities, Emoluments and hereditaments whatsoever withall and singular their and every of their App<sup>ts</sup> in or within the Limits or bounds aforesaid, or to the said Lands lying within the same limits or Bounds belonging or in any wise appertaining. . . . unto the said Edward Hilton his heires, Associates and Assignes forever to the only proper use and behoofe of he said Edward Hilton his heires Associates & Assignes for ever, yielding and paying unto our soveraigne Lord the King one fifth part of Gold and Silver Ores, and another third part to the Councill aforesaid and then successors to be holden of the said Councill and their successors by the rent hereof in these presents Reserved, yielding and paying therefor yearly for ever unto the said Councill their successors or Assignes for every limited Acres of the said Land in use the sume of twelve pence of Lawfull money of England into the hands of the Rent gatherer for the time being of the said Councill or successors or Assignes for all services whatsoever."

The actual delivery of this land was by Thomas Lewis, by power of attorney, to Edward Hilton, on the premises, July 7, 1631, in presence of Thomas Wiggin, William Hilton, Samuel Sharpe, and James Downe.

From this grant proceeded all the land titles in Dover and several neighboring towns. There has lately been raised a question as to what was meant by "the south side of the said river," the river being the Pascataqua, and it has been assumed that the grant covered a "three miles" on the southwesterly side of the river which divides Maine and New Hampshire, up to the present Salmon Falls. This assumption requires the belief that the laying out of the tract in Newington and Stratham was a fraud, that the Massachusetts government was the instrument in committing the fraud, that the owners were the beneficiaries of a known fraud, and that so upright a man as Edward Hilton stood by in silence and saw the fraud committed. The grant undoubtedly conflicted with the Pascataqua grant, but that is to be expected. Great conflicts were usual in the early grants.

There is no question about that portion including present Dover. Anticipating what need not be referred to later, the locating of the territory of this grant in 1656 will show what it covered on the north side, known as the Quamscott:

"Wee whose names are herento subscribed according to an order of the Honored General Court in November 1655, appointing vs to make a just division of the Patent of Quamscott doe this make of retorne: when we came to peruse the Patent wee found it to extend for the length of it from the lower part of the River of Pascataque on the sayd side of the sayd River unto the falls of the sayd River at Exeter & for breadth along the sayd River three miles—from the head lyne for the breadth of it which head lyne wee run upon a south east point of the compass which ended three quarters of a mile beyond Aspe Brooke towards Hampton about forty poles below the high way, where was marked a great oak on four sides. 2ly, from the said head line we measured for the length upon the north East point of the Compas six miles a half the which Extended to that part of the Bay neere Winncomet River. 3ly We also measured a second cross line for length beginning at Quinscotts house, Extending it three miles upon the South East point, where we did make severall pine Trees. The part of the Land belonging to the Patent about & below the great bay was understood to be impossible (as to measuring) by Reason of the Extreme thick swamps—but we took the best information we might, of divers & severall inhabitants of the great bay & of Strawbery Bank & their reports agreed, viz. that from the lower part of the bottom of the Bay, neere to Captaine Champenours house to the River neere the boyling Rock, or thereabouts, all the neck of Land within that line unto the little bay, containing as neere as men of best Experience can informe is about fowre mile square—being all within the Patent. And whereas from n the Easterly part of the great bay being a part of the River we should have measured three miles into the Land we find in that place by Credible information, the Land soe narrow to the Seaward that we cannot allow more according to the Intent of the Patent as we understand it, then one mile & a half to be run from each point of the bottom of the bay upon an Easterly line into the Land."

In this southern tract also Dover had rights which were recognized:

"As also the Land lying upon the bottom of the great bay, being or Extending one mile & a half from every part of the bottom of the bay upon an Easterly line into the woods in which Division all the land & marsh granted unto Dover by the Generall Court shall bee & remaine to them forever: the Land from Keneys Creeke to a certaine come neere the mouth of the great bay, called Hogsty come, with all the marsh from that place round about the bay up to Kittorrells delight, with fowre hundred Acres of vpland as it is granted by the Court bounded layd out & possessed by the inhabitants of Dover with fifty Acres of vpland more about as neere the great Bay with fifty Acres to bee layd out and disposed of by Capt. Richard Walderne to some of the inhabitants of Dover whome hee sees fitt."

The doubt referred to as to the location of the lands on the "south side of the river" has doubtless arisen from ignorance of the fact that the Pascataqua River is not the river which flows from South Berwick down the eastern side of Rollinsford and Dover, but the river which flows from Great Bay by the southern end of Dover Point. Some maps make the mistake. The river from South Berwick (old Quamphegan) to the end of Dover Point is the Newichawannock.

There is no record of any Dover history for the years between the date of the grant and the presence here of Thomas Wiggin, who first appears as witness to the delivery. Belknap says that two-thirds of the patent belonged to some merchants of Bristol, and one-third to some of Shrewsbury; but there is nothing to verify this precise division, and there are records of sales which conflict with it. It is certain, however, that Bristol men were concerned in the enterprise, apparently taking the present Dover as mainly theirs, and it is probable that it was in their interest only that Capt. Thomas Wiggin came here in 1631. He remained here about a year, returning in 1632, in the expectation of procuring men and means to carry on this plantation.

The original settlement of Dover was, so far as it had any religious auspices, by members of the Church of England. Edward Hilton was in that sympathy. It is significant that, notwithstanding his high character, he now held public office, after Massachusetts took possession of the New Hampshire towns, excepting in the one year of union. This is explained by a later statement of his son that the father and sons were adherents of the Established Church.

Under Capt. Thomas Wiggin.—But Capt. Wiggin was of Puritan sympathies. Edward Howes, writing from London to Governor John Winthrop, March 25, 1633, says,—

"There are honest men about to buye out the Bristol mens plantation in Pascataqua, and doe propose to plant there 500 good people before Michelnas next —T. Wiggin is the chief agent therein."

Capt. Wiggin was, of course, in sympathy with the Massachusetts government and policy. While he was still in England, after his visit to the Pascataqua, he is thus spoken of in a letter from Edward Howes to Governor Winthrop, June 22, 1633:

"Before I end, I must not forget to put you in minde of one that is cominge to you, whoe hath deserved exceedingly of your father & the plantation, many wayes; he discovered (under God) our enemies plotts, & helpt to prevent them; he hath also dispossed our enemies of their hope, Pascataqua, and intends to plant him selfe and many crad us men there this summer. Noe doubt but this may be and will be diverse in this shippedd unto you; but out of the mouth of diverse witnesses the truth is confirmed. I have, and you all have cause to blesse God that you have see good a neighbour as Capt. Wiggin."

The sale of the Dover plantation by the Bristol men in 1633, for two thousand one hundred and fifty pounds, is said to have been made to the Puritan Lords Say and Brook, George Willys, and William Whiting. It seems that other persons were concerned, inasmuch as more persons were later concerned in the transfer to Massachusetts. However, Capt. Wiggin was continued in the agency, and on the 10th of October, 1633, landed at Salem, Mass., from the ship "James," with "about thirty" colonists for Dover, "some of whom were of good estates and of some account for religion." "They had been eight weeks between Gravesend and Salem," and they proceeded at once to the settlement on Hilton's Point, Capt. Wiggin writing from that place in November.

It is impossible to give the names of many of these emigrants. Capt. Wiggin's grant of house lots on the high and beautiful lands a mile up from the Point, where they intended to "build a compact town," affords a very few names. John Dam, Thomas Layton appear. But chief in note appears Rev. William Leverich, "an able and worthy Puritan minister," to be minister of the settlement. He remained, however, only until 1635, leaving for inadequacy of support. He went from Dover to Boston, and was admitted a member of the First Church, Aug. 9, 1635, and soon after was of Duxbury, where a lot of land was laid out for him in 1637. He was admitted freeman in the Plymouth Colony, Jan. 2, 1637-38. He was of Sandwich in 1638, as appears by "Plymouth Colony Records," i. 88, and was minister there from near that time (certainly from 1639) until 1652. In 1651 he was studying the Indian language, with a view to labor among that class ("Plymouth Colony Records," ix. 196). In 1633 he was in the service of the commissioners of the United Colonies, laboring among the Indians ("Records," x. 34). In the autumn of that year he was removing to Oyster Bay, L. I., and the vessel carrying his goods was seized by a captain commissioned by the Rhode Island authorities. In 1637 and 1638 he is found at work among the Indians. In 1638 he accompanied the first settlers to Huntington, L. I., of which he was one of the patentees, and resided there until 1670, when he removed to Newtown, L. I., where he died in 1677. He had two sons, Caleb and Eleazer. The latter was married, but left no issue. Caleb had one son and two daughters; the son left posterity.

The colonists built, in 1634 apparently, an humble meeting-house for the worship of God. Where it stood is not accurately known, although it can be approximated as not far from the Back Cove. The establishment of public worship and a regular ministry in 1633 gives this old parish, whose two hundred and fiftieth anniversary is to be observed in the autumn of 1883, the priority in the parishes of New Hampshire.

During Capt. Wiggin's superintendency nothing appears but the granting of house lots, and that the object of the settlement had turned from mere fishing to trade with the Indians in furs and useless explorations for valuable minerals and metals. Darby Field was here, an Irish explorer, who was, in 1642, the first white man to visit the White Mountains. There was no power of government, unless voluntarily submitted to. Within a year after the added colonization Governor Winthrop says,—

"Capt. Wiggin wrote to the Governor that one of his people had stabbed another, and desired he might be tried in the [Massachusetts] bay if the party died. The Governor answered that if Pascataqua lay within their limits (as it was supposed) they would try him."

Nothing further appears as to this case, but it is significant of the feeling of Massachusetts, which was jealous of colonies on its northern border, and which, eight years after, succeeded in obtaining control of the Pascataqua.

The name of Bloody Point came to be attached to part of Newington (long in Dover jurisdiction) during Capt. Wiggin's control. The two patents, the Dover (or Swanscot) and the Pascataqua (or Portsmouth) conflicted. A point of land in the now Newington was convenient for each, and included in each. Capt. Wiggin, agent for the upper plantation, and Capt. Neal, agent for the lower, disputed about its possession, and drew their swords. "But," says Hubbard, "both the litigants had so much wit in their anger as to waive the battle, each accounting himself to have done very manfully in what was threatened, so as in respect, not of what did, but what might have fallen out, the place to this day retains the formidable name of Bloody Point."

Under George Burdett.—In 1637, or perhaps in 1636, Rev. George Burdett came to Dover, successor of Rev. William Leverich. He had been a minister of the Church of England, employed at Yarmouth, England, as lecturer. Here he fell into difficulty from real or pretended scruples as to some of the ceremonies of the church; had in April, 1635, been suspended by the high commission court, and precipitately took passage for New England, leaving behind, in distressed circumstances, a wife and family. He landed at Salem, and became a member of the church there, and was admitted freeman Sept. 2, 1635. He soon, perhaps in 1636, came to Dover, where he was received as preacher. He was a man of marked abilities, and became, in 1637, the principal magistrate. A letter to him and Wiggin, in September or October, from Governor Winthrop, found Burdett in authority. Belknap, writing in Massachusetts' sympathies, says that he "thrust out" Capt. Wiggin, "who had been placed there by the Lords and others." But the "Lords and others" were a mere planting and trading corporation, and had no power of government. Mr. Burdett was made ruler by the agreement of the people, who were otherwise destitute of civil government. It was a democratic election in the necessities of the case. He was not, however, in favor with Massachusetts. He wrote to Archbishop Laud from Salem, December, 1635, explaining his course, and attempting a reconciliation. This letter is extant in the Public Record Office, London. A second letter, written from Dover, in 1637, is not preserved, but it became known, as did all such documents, to the Massachusetts government, by means of the agents it employed. Its drift was that it was not new church discipline aimed at in Massachusetts, but sovereignty. The amount of truth in this letter was particularly offensive to the Bay government, which as easily found the contents of the archbishop's reply in 1638, thanking Burdett for his zeal. A third letter from the latter, still preserved, was written from Dover, Nov. 29, 1638, in which he reiterates his declarations as to Massachusetts, speaks of the river Pascataqua as valuable for harbor, the desire of Massachusetts to obtain control of that harbor, the need of securing it for His Majesty's use, and the value of the plantation as a place for "loyal" settlers. He says also that government ought to be established on the river, there being only "combinations," and that for a year previous "ye helme" had been in his hands.

Capt. John Underhill and the Ministers.—It was in the autumn of 1638 that Capt. John Underhill came from Boston to Dover. He was a native of Warwickshire, England. A soldier by profession and seemingly a free lance, he had served with reputation in the Netherlands, in Ireland, and at Cadiz, and was still a young man when he was captain of a company of auxiliaries under the Count of Nassau. John Winthrop needed a soldier of experience, and he induced Underhill to join the Massachusetts emigration of 1630. His name stands the fifty-seventh in the list of members of the Boston First Church, the church of the emigration. His first wife, Helena, a native of Holland, where he married her, became a member of that church Dec. 16, 1638.

To the first General Court of Massachusetts, that of 1634, Underhill was a deputy from Boston. Governor Winthrop speaks of him occasionally as performing various services in the routine of affairs. When, in 1631, the mysterious Sir Christopher Gardiner had been arrested and taken into Plymouth, he was brought to Boston by Capt. Underhill; and when Roger Williams was to be arrested, that he might be returned to England, the warrant was sent to Underhill. On the 25th of October, 1631, "the Governor, with Capt. Underhill and others of the officers, went on foot to Sagus, and next day to Salem, where they were bountifully entertained by Capt. Endecott." On the 30th of August, 1632, "ten sagamores and many Indians" were said to be assembled at Brookline, and Capt. Underhill was sent out with "twenty musketeers" to investigate. In September of that year a camp was established at Boston "to exercise the soldiers against need might be;" and the old captain one night "(to try how they would behave themselves) caused an alarm to be given upon the quarters, which discovered the weakness of our people, who, like men amazed, knew not how to behave themselves." In 1637 he was a member of the artillery company which still exists. The duty of training the raw but courageous material of Massachusetts militia was varied in 1634 by a visit across the ocean, for which he had "leave to go see his friends in Holland." "I wrote you," wrote Governor John Winthrop, 12th December, 1634, to his son John, in London, "by Capt. Underhill, who went hence in Mr. Babb's ship."

But he saw some service. The murder of John Oldham at Block Island by the Indians, in 1636, provoked punishment. On the 24th of August, ordered by the Governor and Council, an expedition set sail from Boston. It consisted of four companies of twenty men each,—Underhill being senior captain,—the whole being under command of "John Endecott, Esq., one of the assistants." They reached Block Island, landed with but two casualties to the enemy, killed and wounded a few Indians, and burnt the wigwams and some corn; went thence to Pequot Harbor with similar results, and on the 14th of September arrived home at Boston.

On the 10th of April, 1637, Underhill was sent with twenty men, by his friend Governor Henry Vane, to Saybrook, "to keep the fort, both in respect of the Indians, and especially of the Dutch." The Indian hostilities soon determined Massachusetts to send a much larger force, but it had not arrived when the work was done. The Connecticut towns placed ninety men and some Indian auxiliaries, under the command of Capt. John Mason, also a former soldier of the Netherlands. Underhill at once united with Mason, and on the morning of the 26th of May they attacked the Pequot fort at Mystic. The whites were divided into two parties, Underhill leading on one side and Mason on the other, and stormed the fort. A hand-to-hand conflict ensued. The plate-armor and firearms of the whites gave them an immense advantage, but the vastly superior numbers of the Indians, who fought with desperation, was not to be despised. "We must burn them," said Mason; and he hurled a blazing torch into their mats. Six hundred Indians were slain, and the power of the Pequots was broken. Of this affair Underhill afterwards published, in England, a narrative entitled, "News from New England," containing an engraved plan of the fort and the assault. "Great and doleful," says Underhill, "was the bloody sight to the view of the young soldiers, to see so many souls lie gasping on the ground, so thick you could hardly pass along." "We had sufficient light from the Word of God for our proceedings."

But the religious controversy styled "Antinomian" began to rend the young commonwealth. "One Mrs. Hutchinson," writes Winthrop in October, 1636, "a member of the church of Boston, a woman of a ready wit and bold spirit, brought over with her two dangerous errors: 1. That the person of the Holy Ghost dwells in a justified person. 2. That no sanctification can help to evidence to us our justification. From these two grew many branches. . . . There joined with her in these opinions a brother of hers, one Mr. Wheelwright, a silenced minister some time in England." The new doctrine rapidly gained adherents. The young Governor Vane, whom Forster calls "one of the greatest and purest men that ever walked the earth," favored complete liberty of opinion. John Cotton, teacher of the Boston Church, became entangled in the heresies. And that church itself was, "all save five or six," captured by Mrs. Hutchinson. The sentiment of Boston was, however, overpowered by that of the country towns. The General Court stood firm. Homogeneity of faith seemed essential in the early life of the colony. Religious liberty was no theory of the Bay emigrants. They came to the wilderness to enjoy their own freedom, but not to allow freedom to any who differed from them. Others had other parts of the wilderness open before them.

Mr. Wheelwright was summoned before the court of March, 1637, on account of a sermon he had preached on a fast-day. That sermon is still preserved, and it is difficult to see wherein it was dangerous, but he was adjudged guilty of "sedition and contempt." A remonstrance or petition was offered to the court, signed by many members of the Boston Church, containing, says Winthrop, "scandalous and seditious speeches,"—though none such appear in the paper,<sup>1</sup>— for which the signers soon after felt the vengeance of the rulers. The election in May threw the tolerant Vane out of office, and Winthrop was again placed in the Governor's chair; but Boston shared its spirit by immediately choosing Vane as one of its deputies. On a shallow pretext, Vane and his colleague were rejected, "the court being grieved" at their election, finding "a means to send them home again," and the next day Boston re-elected them. But Vane, to whom and to Charles II. alike the now Duke of Cleveland traces his lineage, disappointed in his hopes of liberty, returned to England.

The power was in the hands of the opponents of Mrs. Hutchinson, and it was boldly used. A synod of all the churches in New England was summoned. Closing on the 22d of September, it condemned eighty-two "erroneous opinions" and nine "unwholesome expressions," scarce a sentence of which had anybody attested or believed. Convinced "that two so opposite parties could not contain in the same body without apparent hazard of ruin to the whole," the triumphant majority proceeded to act. Mr. Wheelwright and Mrs. Hutchinson were banished, Wheelwright being forced to leave the colony in the deep snows which periled his life in his journey to Pascataqua. Some were disfranchised and some deprived of public office. The signers of the petition were remembered, and fifty-eight of them, citizens of Boston, and seventeen of other towns, were disarmed, being ordered "to deliver in at Mr. Cane's house at Boston all such guns, pistols, swords, powder, shot, and match, as they shall be owners of or have in their custody," and they were forbidden to buy or borrow any more.

Of those disarmed John Underhill's name has the honor of heading the list. On the 12th of October, 1637, there had been a day of thanksgiving kept for the victories against the Pequots, and "the captains and soldiers who had been in the late service were feasted." In the next month the sword he had gallantly won at Mystic he was forced to "deliver in at Mr. Cane's," because of speculations on the doctrine of justification by faith. Deprived of his sword, he was also deprived of his office and disfranchised. He endeavored to argue the case. He "insisted much on the liberty which all States do allow to military officers for plainness of speech, etc., and that he himself had sometimes spoken so freely to Count Nassau." But his remonstrance was useless. His good sword had done the State some service, but he had doubted the magistrates' doctrine of the Holy Ghost.

Underhill made a short visit to Europe. Returning, he proposed to join Mr. Wheelwright's new settlement at Swamscot Falls. But first he asked the court to give him the three hundred acres of land it had once promised him, and at the same time he made a kind of apology for "condemning the court." The court (that of September, 1638) does not appear to have given the promised land, but, on the contrary, took occasion to question him "about some speeches he had used in the ship lately in his return out of England, viz., that he should say that we were zealous here as the Scribes and Pharisees were, and as Paul was before his conversion," and that he came to his "assurance" "as he was taking a pipe of tobacco." The first charge he denied, but Winthrop says it was proved by the testimony of a "godly woman." The second he defended, "showing that inasmuch as the Lord was pleased to convert Paul as he was persecuting, etc., so He might manifest Himself to him as he was taking the moderate use of the creature called tobacco." As to his "retraction" of obnoxious "remonstrance," he admitted that he meant to retract the manner but not the matter of it. Another charge, that of immoral conduct, was not "clearly" proved.

He was banished from the jurisdiction, and so in the autumn of 1638 he came to Dover. A hardy soldier of the Netherland wars, fresh from the sturdy storming of the Pequot fort, and one who took "great pride in his bravery and apparel," he was gladly welcomed by the small settlement. Nor was it in the minds of the people here anything to his discredit that he had fallen under the displeasure of the Bay Puritans. In the course of a few weeks, certainly by December, by the voice of the people he had superseded Burdett, and was Governor of Dover, and chief magistrate of its court.

Whittier, almost the poet of the Pascataqua, so tenderly he sings its legends, has written, with pardonable license, as follows:

"A score of years had come and gone
Since the Pilgrims landed on Plymouth stone,
When Captain Underhill, bearing scars
From Indian ambush and Flemish wars,
Left three-hilled Boston and wandered down
East by north to Cochecho town.

"He cheered his heart as he rode along
With sacred of Scripture and holy song,
Or thought how he rode with his launces free
By the Lower Rhine and the Zuyder Zee,
Till his wool-path grew to a trodden road,
And Hilton Point in the distance showed.

"Godly and stately and grace to see,
Into the clearing's space rode he,
With the sun on the hilt of his sword in sheath,
And his silvers buckles and spurs beneath;
And the settlers welcomed him, one and all,
From swift Quamphegan to Gonic fall."

Underhill had not been made Governor when the hostility of Massachusetts pursued him. The Bay imagined itself also to have another grievance in that Dover people had given aid to Mr. Wheelwright's settling at Exeter. Perhaps they had fed Wheelwright's wife and family in February as they sailed up the Pascataqua, and so on to Exeter. By order of the very court which banished Underhill (doubtless at a later session), the Governor wrote to Mr. Burdett, then Governor, Mr. Wiggin, and others to this effect: "That whereas there had been good correspondence between us formerly, we could not but be sensible of their entertaining and countenancing, etc., some that we had cast out, etc., and that our purpose was to survey our utmost limits and make use of them." The government of the Bay kept a watchful eye on the colonies which adjoined it on the north. The Pascatagua had a harbor, which made it independent of Boston as a seaport. Its founders were of a different spirit, as well as of different origin. The river was peopled mainly by the hardy West-of-England stock. The majority of the people favored, so far as any religion, the ancestral Church of England. Here the disaffected or banished citizens of Massachusetts could find welcome. Such a free colony was a standing menace to Massachusetts. A claim by the Bay to a right over the Pascatagua had been hinted at before; now for the first time there was openly avowed a construction of their patent which, though now acknowledged, and in the next century finally defeated, would have reached far beyond the whole of what is now Southern New Hampshire.

To this letter Burdett returned what Winthrop calls a "scornful" answer. Such an answer would naturally and reasonably be given to such a threat. The Pascatagua was held under patents from the same authority as that of Massachusetts. Evidently it was this threat which caused Burdett to write to Archbishop Laud, Nov. 29, 1638, communicating the tendency of Massachusetts to a practical independence, and its purpose to get control of Pascatagua River, a copy of which letter, of course, Massachusetts in due time received by means of the secret agents it employed, even in the archbishop's trusted household,—a wonderful Providence they used to call such good fortune.

Burdett's reply greatly irritated the Bay government, so much so that the Governor "was prepared to summon him to appear at our court to answer his contempt," on the ground that Burdett had once been a citizen of Massachusetts, and was still a member of the church in Salem. But policy prevailed. If Burdett "should suffer," Winthrop ingenuously records, "it might ingratiate him with the archbishop." He might as well have recorded that such a summons would have been useless unless backed by a military force, and the times were not ripe for that. It was therefore determined to "undermine him."

In the mean time, soon after Underhill's departure from Boston, alleged proof was had of the criminal conduct of which he had been suspected. The church in Boston summoned him to answer in person to this charge, and the Governor and Council sent him a safe-conduct. He refused to go unless his banishment should be first rescinded, and, if Winthrop is correct, alleged that the safe-conduct lacked authority. The General Court then sent him one for three months, but it was equally disregarded.

To "undermine" Burdett, Winthrop wrote to Edward Hilton, 13th Dec., 1638. He inclosed a copy of Burdett's "scornful" reply, "advising them to take heed how they put themselves in his power, etc., but rather to give us a proof of their respect towards us." The Governor "intimated withal how ill it would relish if they should advance Capt. Underhill, whom he had thrust out," and he gave information also of Underhill's alleged criminal conduct. But before this letter reached Dover Underhill had been chosen Governor, and Hanserd Knollys had organized the First Church in Dover, being the first church organized on New Hampshire soil, and second in date to the Hampton Church, which was organized in Massachusetts.

The new church wrote to the church in Boston in commendation of Underhill, styling him their right worshipful and honored Governor. That church, nevertheless, determined to proceed with the charges against him. The court of 13th of March, 1639, sent him another safe-conduct, "to come to answer the church of Boston between this and the General Court of the 22d of the 3d month (May) next," which proved useless. Massachusetts was persistent. At the court just mentioned, the first in 1639, "It was ordered that letters should be written to Capt. Wiggin, Capt. Champernoone, Mr. Williams, Mr. Wamerton, Mr. Edward Hilton, Mr. Trelworthy, and their neighbors, and Mr. Bartholomew<sup>1</sup> to carry the same and have instructions."

Winthrop says of these letters, "The General Court wrote to all the chief inhabitants of Pascatuaguck and sent them a copy of his (Underhill's) letters (wherein he professed himself to be an instrument ordained of God for our ruin), to know whether it were with their privacy and consent that he sent us such a defiance, etc., and whether they would maintain him in such practices against us, etc."

The substance of the replies, as given by Winthrop, was this: The Dover "plantation disclaimed to have any hand in his miscarriages, etc., and offered to call him to account, etc., whenever we would send any to inform against him,"—evidently a reply mildly declining any acknowledging Massachusetts authority. "The others at the river's mouth," says Winthrop, "disclaimed likewise, and shared their indignation against his insolences, and their readiness to join in any fair cause for our satisfaction; only they desired us to have some compassion of him, and not to send any forces against him," which, being interpreted, probably objected to any attempt of Massachusetts to carry out by force its threatened extension of boundary. "After this," says Winthrop, "Capt. Underhill's courage was abated, for the chiefest in the river fell from him, and the rest little regarded him, so as he wrote letters of retraction to divers."

Prior to this, however, Burdett's letter home had replies from the "archbishops and the lords commissioners for plantations." By the wonderful Providence which regularly disclosed to the Bay government letters opposing them, a copy of a letter of Burdett of the preceding autumn had been furnished by "one of Pascataquaack having opportunity to go into Mr. Burdett's study." Winthrop's abstract of this letter is "that he did delay to go into England because he would fully inform himself of the state of the people in regard of allegiance, and that it was not [church] discipline that was now so much aimed at as sovereignty, and that it was accounted perjury and treason to our General Court to speak of appeals to the king,"—an abstract which does not correspond with Burdett's actual letter.

By another remarkable Providence the answers of the "archbishops and lords-commissioners for plantations," which were brought by "the first ships which came this year,"—that is, in the spring of 1639,—lay in the bay above fourteen days, and although the Governor and some of the Council "thought it not safe to meddle with them," yet the letters were opened without "any of their privity or consent." The Lord thanked Mr. Burdett for his zeal, and would take a time to redress the disorders of which he had informed them. When Burdett found that his letters had been opened he was indignant, but there proved to be no redress. It was an added but needless Providence that somebody at Dover also sent to Massachusetts a copy of the same letter.

But in 1639, Burdett, detected in some loose actions, went across the river into Maine. There he was placed in authority, to which the coming of Thomas Gorges in 1640 put an end. On the 23d 12 mo., 1640,—that is, Feb. 23, 1641,—Gorges wrote to Governor Winthrop as follows:

"Mr. Burdith [Burdett] is at Pemiquad, which lies on the borders of this Province. He is grown to that height of sin that it is to [be] feared he is given over. His time he spends in drinkinge, dancinge, singinge scurrulous songs; for his companions he selects the wretchedest people of the country; at the springe I hear he is for England."

In that spring he returned to England, joined the royal troops, was captured by the Parliament forces, was thrown into prison, and disappears from history.

At a General Court in 1639 some of the people of Dover wrote to Massachusetts, proposing that Dover come under that jurisdiction. Who led in this movement no records show. It was, of course, the Puritan element, and Underhill's proceedings later in the year indicate a probability that he, the chief magistrate, was concerned in it. Answer was returned that if the people would send "two or three" with full powers, it was likely the court would agree to their proposal. Governor Underhill then wrote, 12th October, 1639, asking a safe-conduct for such as should be sent from Dover, but taking the opportunity to refer to his own affairs, and intimating that he was endeavoring to help forward the business.

At the court of November, 1639, three commissioners appeared from Dover, whose names are not preserved. The court appointed three persons to treat with them. The appointment and result is recorded thus:

"The Deputy Govern[er] [_____] Mr. Emmanuel Downing, & Capt. Edward Gibbons were appointed to treat with the three committees from the towne of Dover upon Pascataqua, wth whom they did agree, and certified the same."

A particular account of this transaction is given by Winthrop:

"And now at this Court, came three wth commission to agree upon certain articles annexed to their commission, which being read, the court appointed three to treat with them; but their articles not being reasonable, they stand not upon them, but confessed that they had absolute comensure on to conclude by their discretion. Whereupon the treaty was brought to a conclusion to this effect. That they should be as Ipswich and Salem, and have courts there, etc., as by the copy of the agreement remaining with the recorder doth appear. This was notified under our public seal, and so delivered to them; only they desired a promise from the court, that, if the people did not assent to it, (which yet they had no fear of) they might be at liberty, which was granted them."

Hanserd Knollys was now pastor of the church; he wrote, Jan. 21, 1640, a kindly letter. Born in Cawwell, Lincolnshire, England, in 1598, of pious parents; educated at the university at Cambridge; after graduation was chosen master of the free school at Gainsborough; ordained June 30, 1629; received from the bishop of Lincoln the living of Humberstone; was indefatigable in labor; became scrupulous as to "the lawfulness of using the surplice, the cross in baptism, and the admission of persons of profane character to the Lord's Supper;" and therefore resigned his living after holding it "two or three years;" preached two or three years longer in various churches by the bishop's good nature; in or about 1636 he renounced his Episcopal ordination and joined the Puritans; was imprisoned, released, harassed, and left England.

Knollys came to Boston in 1638. His child had died on the passage. He was very poor. Some money of his wife's had paid their passage, he having on embarking "just six brass farthings left." The Boston ministers represented to the magistrats that he was an Antinomian, and advised that he be not allowed to remain. At Boston, he says, "I was necessitated to work daily with my hoe for the space of almost three weeks." Two persons from Dover happened to be in Boston, and invited him to go to Dover. He did so, but by Rev. George Burdett, then ruler, was forbidden to preach. Burdett was speedily superseded in the government by Capt. John Underhill. Knollys began to preach, and in December, 1638, he organized the first church in Dover.

From Dover, Knollys, incensed with his treatment by the Massachusetts government, early wrote to England, inveighing against that power. He compared it especially to the High Commission Court. Coming from a Puritan, this letter was calculated to be very harmful, and it excited great resentment in the Bay, where, of course, a copy was sent back by agents in England.

The commissioners returned to Dover. Their agreement was not ratified by the people. Underhill was afterwards charged with being chiefly instrumental in its rejection, while "he had written to our Governor and laid it upon the people, especially upon some among them; and for this they produced against him a letter from our Governor, written to one of their commissioners in answer to a letter of his, wherein he had discovered the captain's proceedings in this matter."

It does not appear that any further proceedings were had in the Dover Court, or that any copy of Knollys' letter to England was forwarded. It was the rather in accordance with the steady policy of Massachusetts to cause the Governor and the minister of Dover to answer in person before the Boston Church and the Bay magistrates. This course was in tacit harmony with the yet quiescent claim of jurisdiction.

The result was that both persons went to Boston. Each had a safe-conduct, dated Jan. 29, 1640.

Regarding Knollys, Winthrop says, date not given, but apparently in March, "Upon a lecture day at Boston (most of the magistrates and elders in the Bay being there assembled), he [Knollys] made a very full and free confession of his offence, with much aggravation against himself, so as the Assembly were well satisfied. He wrote also a letter to the same effect to his said friends in England, which he left with the Governor to be sent to there." A copy of this letter is preserved.

It is difficult to account for the intensity of language in his letter to Winthrop and apparently in his public confession. Had he committed murder, he would have found it difficult to find stronger expressions of remorse. There may be two explanations. One is the exaggerated and morbid style of that day, the other is that Knollys, really a Puritan, came to see that Puritanism, true religion as he believed, had its only American bulwark in the power of Massachusetts. His own surroundings impressed it upon him. Prelate at the lower Pascataqua, prelate across the Newichawannock, partly prelate and partly indifferent at his home, the Bay had his returning sympathies, and to help its enemies in England seemed a great sin. But certainly most of his original letter, even as reported to us, was but simple truth.

Underhill also went to Boston and made his confessions of far different offenses. He did not have the success of the simple-hearted Knollys. Massachusetts had had experience of his double-dealing, and her astute ministers and magistrates could readily detect any want of sincerity. Winthrop's description is peculiar:

"Capt. Underhill also being struck with horror and remorse for his offences, both against the church and civil State, could have no rest till he had obtained a safe-conduct to come and give satisfaction; and accordingly (11) 5 [5 March, 1640], at a lecture at Boston (it being court time), he made a public confession both of his living in adultery with Faber's wife (upon suspicion whereof the church had before admonished him) and attempting the like with another woman, and also the injury he had done to our State, etc. and acknowledged the justice of the court in their proceedings against him, etc. Yet all his confessions were mixed with such excuses and extenuations, as did not give satisfaction of the truth of his repentance, so as it seemed to be done rather out of policy and to parry the sting of his conscience than in sincerity. But, however, his offences being so foul and scandalous, the church presently cast him out; which censure he seemed to submit unto, and for the time he lay in Boston (being four or five days) he was very much dejected," etc.

Underhill returned to Dover before the middle of March, but evidently in no pleasant frame of mind. Winthrop is our only authority again for his proceedings:

"But being gone back, he soon recovered his spirits again, or at least gave not that proof of a broken heart as he gave hope of at Boston; for (to ingratiate himself with the State of England and with some gentlemen at the river's mouth, who were very zealous that way, and had lately set up common prayer, etc.) he sent thirteen men armed to Exeter to fetch one Gabriel Fish, who was detained in the officer's hand for speaking against the king,<sup>1</sup> the magistrates of Exeter being then in the Bay to take advice what to do with him."

Knollys remained in Boston until after the 23d of March. On that day he consulted with the Boston Church as to the proper treatment of excommunicated members.

The people of Dover, of course, were informed of Underhill's confessions of criminality, and they proceeded to action. Winthrop says of this action, completed before the middle of April, 1640,—

"When the church and people of Dover desired him to forbear to come to the next court, till they had considered of his case, and he had promised so to do, yet, hearing that they were consulting to remove him from his government, he could not refrain, but came and took his place in the court. . . . In the open court he committed one of his fellow-magistrates for rising up and saying he would not sit with an adulterer, etc. . . . And though he had offered to lay down his place, yet, when he saw they went about it, he grew passionate and expostulated with them, and would not stay to receive his dismission, nor would he be seen to accept it when it was sent after him. Yet they proceeded, and chose one Roberts to be president of the court, and soon after they returned back Fish to Exeter."

In this action against Underhill three points appear to have been made: first, his criminal conduct, acknowledged in Boston; secondly, his arbitrary conduct upon the bench; and, thirdly, his double-dealing in a matter of union with Massachusetts, having, in his letters to Governor Winthrop, laid the blame of failure upon some citizens of Dover, while he himself was the chief cause. It does not appear that he was deprived of his military command nor of a subordinate magistracy. He appears in both these capacities in the confusions of the spring of 1644, a year later. But his governorship was at an end.

The "one Roberts" who succeeded Underhill as chief magistrate of Dover was Thomas Roberts, ancestor of the extensive family of that name in New Hampshire and Maine. Tradition makes him a native of Wales, and a very early settler, even so far as to claim that he came with Edward Hilton, of which, however, there is no evidence. He lived on the east side of the Neck, below Meeting-house Hill.

Bishop's "New England Judged" says that Thomas Roberts, in 1662, had "lived in Dover thirty years, and a member of their church above twenty years." He was at the time of his election a member of the church, and was probably one of its original members. Bishop says also that in 1662 "his labour was at an end," and that the authorities "took away his card for not coming to their worship" in the time of the Quaker troubles.

Underhill again went to Boston, going "by water." He was there on the 20th of April, "to tender (as he said) satisfaction to the church." Some of the magistrates regarded this as presumptuous, and would have had him imprisoned, on the ground that he had used his safe-conduct already. But the date of its limit had not yet expired, and it was deemed wise not to arrest him, "seeing it might be objected against us to our great prejudice when we should not have opportunity to clear our innocency;" that is, in England. The church would not, however, admit him to public speech, and after a week's visit he returned to Dover, passing the Sabbath at Salem on his way. While in Boston he addressed to the Governor a characteristic letter.

On the 3d day of September, 1640, Underhill again appeared in Boston. This time it was to make full and humble confession. Winthrop is again our authority:

"Capt. Underhill being brought, by the blessing of God in this church's censure of excommunication, to remorse for his foul sins, obtained, by means of the elders, and others of the church in Boston, a safe-conduct under the hand of the governor and one of the council to repair to the church. He came at the time of the court of assistants, and upon the lecture day, after sermon, the pastor called him forth and declared the occasion, and then gave him leave to speak; and indeed it was a spectacle which caused many weeping eyes. . . . He came in his worst clothes (being accustomed to take great pride in his bravery and neatness) without a band, in a foul linen cap pulled close to his eyes; and standing apart upon a form, he did, with many deep sighs and abundance of tears, lay open his wicked course. . . . In the end he earnestly and humbly besought the church to have compassion of him, and to deliver him out of the hands of Satan. So, accordingly, he was received into the church again; and after he came into the Court (for the general court began soon after) and made confession of his sin against them, etc., and desired pardon."

Besides being restored to the church, he was released from banishment, and he returned to Dover.

In September, 1640, Rev. Hugh Peter was in Dover. A letter from him to Governor Winthrop bears date only "Salem, vlt. Sept." It says, "What my adventure was at Pascataway I suppose Mr. Larkham hath told you, and if death prevent me not, I shall my self shortly. . . . What past betwixt Mr. Williams at Pascataway and myself I shall tell you."

The only allusion to this visit yet found is an incidental one in Winthrop's journal, in the last of that year. A "great ship called the 'Charles,' of above 300 tons," with a wicked crew, was "at Pascataquack to take in clapboards, with another ship, wherein Mr. Peter, by occasion, preached one Lord's day," and the crew of the "Charles" "did use all the means they could to disturb the exercise by hooting and helleoing."

Why the restless and scheming Hugh Peter was at Pascataqua, interviewing Mr. Larkham at Dover and Mr. Williams at the mouth of the river, and then reporting to Governor Winthrop, has to be inferred. But inasmuch as Underhill was again scheming to secure the submission of the Pascataqua to the Massachusetts government, the object of this visit of Peter is sufficiently evident.

CHAPTER CXII.

THE COMBINATION.

THAT the people of Dover had had a "combination" for government in the time of Burdett has been shown by the letter of that person dated Nov. 29, 1638, wherein also it appears that he had held power for the preceding year in such a combination. Whether this combination had dissolved, or whether a new one might be considered more binding, or the old one was not sufficiently formal, a new one was entered into on the 20th of October, 1640. This document is the oldest document of Dover history.

"Whereas, sundry mischeifes and inconveniences have befallen us, and more and greater may in regard of want of civill Government, his Grations Ma<sup>tie</sup> having hitherto settled no order for us to our knowledge:

<sup>1</sup> His homestead was devised by will, 27th September, 1673 (proved 20th June, 1674), to his son-in-law, Richard Rich. It was purchased in 1706 by Judge John Tuttle, who devised it (28th December, 1717, proved 12th July, 1720) to his son, Ebenezer Tuttle, who sold it to Capt. Thomas Mellet.

"Wee whose names are underwritten being Inhabitants upon the River Piscataquaek have voluntarily agreed to combine ourselves into a body politique that wee may the more comfortably enjoy the benefit of his Ma<sup>ty</sup> Lawes together with all such Orders as shall be concluded by a major part of the Freemen of our Society in case they bee not repngnant to the Lawes of England and administered in the behalfe of his Majesty.

"The Combination for Government by y<sup>e</sup> people at Pasetaq 1640 Rec'd abt. 13th Febr. 82-3."

This combination appears to have embraced all the important names in Dover. We miss those of Edward Hilton and Thomas Wiggin, but both those persons had removed outside the limits of the patent. On the roll is the name of Underhill, the commander of the military forces, although he was still continuing his machinations for union with Massachusetts; Knollys and Larkham, the two clergymen, of university education, soon to be at the head of rival factions; William Walderne and William Pomfret, successively recorders; Edward Colcord, an unpleasantly active citizen, to whom Hubbard gives an apocryphal governorship; Roberts, president of the court; Emery, a wealthy land-owner, ancestor of judges; Starbuck, an elder in the Dover Church; Hall, whose beautiful farm on the Great Bay became the foundation of the great modern properties of his descendants, the March and Peirce families; Rawlins, whose picture-que lands on the Piscataqua are still held by descendants of his name, and whose posterity numbers judges and senators; Champernoone, in whose veins flowed the blood of the Plantagenets, and no less honored in being the kinsman of Gilbert and Raleigh; Richard Walderne, many years a Speaker of the Massachusetts Assembly, and commander of the soldiers of New Hampshire in years of Indian warfare. Of the whole at least fifteen are still represented on Dover soil by descendants of their own name.

The importance of this list, however, makes each name deserving of particular notice. The word "Protest" in the notes below denotes that the same name is on the protest against annexation to Massachusetts in 1641, which will be given farther on. "Register" means the "New England Historical and Genealogical Register." "Taxed, 1648," refers to the oldest extant tax-list.

Beck, Henry. Protest, 1641. Taxed, 1648 only. Is said to have come from Hertfordshire, in the ship "Angel Gabriel," wrecked at Pennaquid, Aug. 15, 1635, and to have married Ann Frost, of Piscataqua. He was ancestor of the late distinguished Theodoric Romeyn Beck, M.D., LL.D., medical professor and author, who died Nov. 19, 1855.

Bowden, William. No further mention. Savage says only "Maine, 1642."

Camond, Abel. No further mention. Savage gives not even the surname. Was there an Abel Camock? Canney, Thomas. Often Kenny. Protest, 1641. Sent over by Capt. John Mason about 1631. Taxed 1648 and onwards. Was living in 1677. Of his family are known only wife Jane, and children:

1. Thomas, born before 1645, whose widow was taxed in 1675.

2. Joseph, married Dec. 25, 1670, Mary Clements.

3. Daughter, married Henry Hobbs.

4. Mary, married Jeremy Tehbets.

Doubtless there were others, as later families cannot be accounted for by these sons alone. Thomas J. Canney and others now represent this family in Dover.

Champernoone, Francis, of the blood-royal of England. An exhaustive memoir by the late learned Charles W. Tattle, of Boston, was partially printed in the Register, xxviii.

Colcord, Edward. Protest, 1641. By deposition, 1659, he was then forty-three years of age; by one of 1673, fifty-six years of age. That his employment by Wheelwright to purchase lands was in 1629 is of course absurd. Hubbard says he came over in 1631, but absurdly says he was afterwards Governor of Dover; his dignity was that of one of three commissioners for cases under twenty shillings in value.

He was of Hampton by 1645. Court records are full of his lawsuits, and he was repeatedly complained of for litigiousness. Some of the trouble was from the fact that he was a sturdy opponent of Massachusetts up to a certain date. William Hilton was once his surety. He died Feb. 10, 1681-82. He had wife Anne, and children:

1. Jonathan, who died Aug. 31, 1661, in his twenty-first year.

2. Mary, born Oct. 14, 1649; married, Dec. 25, 1670, Benjamin Fifield.

3. Edward, born Feb. 2, 1651-52; killed by Indians June 13, 1677. Farmer's notes to Belknap wrongly say it should be Abraham. His widow died Jan. 24, 1688-89.

4. Samuel.

5. Hannah, married, Dec. 28, 1665, Thomas Dearborn; she died July 17, 1729.

6. Sarah, married, Dec. 30, 1668, John Hobbs.

7. Shua, born June 12, 1669.

8. Deborah, born May 21, 1664; married Tristram Coffin.

9. Abigail, born July 23, 1667.

10. Mehitable, married, Dec. 29, 1697 (his second wife), Nathaniel Stevens, of Dover.

Crosse, John. Had Back River lot in 1642. No further mention in Dover. Savage makes him afterwards of Ipswich.

Dam, John. Protest, 1641. Was apparently in the Wiggim emigration; lived in Dover, and died there Jan. 27, 1689-90. Will dated May 19, 1687, proved March 23, 1693-94; gave property to sons John and William, and daughter Judith Tibbets. Grants are on Dover records. He had wife Elizabeth, and children:

1. John, of Bloody Point, taxed 1662 and onward. He married (1) a daughter of Sgt. John Hall; (2) Nov. 9, 1664, Elizabeth, daughter of William Furber, and left issue.

2. Elizabeth, born May 1, 1649.

3. Mary, born Sept. 4, 1651.

4. William, born Oct. 14, 1653; married Martha, daughter of William Pomfret, and left issue.

5. Susanna, born Dec. 14, 1661.

6. Judith, born Nov. 15, 1666; married, July 6, 1684, Capt. Thomas Tebbets, and left issue.

The name is now written Dame. Samuel H. Dame and others are descendants in Dover. The late Judge Dame, of Rochester, was a descendant, as was also Jonathan, many years a bank-cashier in this city. Descendants are also eminent Episcopal clergymen. Harriet F. Dame, a native of Barnstead, who received the thanks of the New Hampshire Legislature for her tender services to the sick and wounded in the field for four years, 1861-65, is of this family.

Dunstar, Thomas. Protest, 1641, as "Durstin." No further mention here. Perhaps "Dustin," and later of Kittery. (See Savage.) Thomas Durston, of Haverhill, was appointed June 8, 1703, administrator of estate of father Thomas, late of Kittery. The husband of Mrs. Dustan famous in Indian wars was one of his descendants, and the Emerson family of Dover trace back to that origin.

Emery, Anthony. Taxed 1648; his "house" taxed 1649 and 1650. Had plenty of grants in Dover. Conveyed his house, etc., at Dover Neck to William Pomfret, Aug. 1, 1651, as "of Colcharberte, in the Province of maine." His son James, in deposition, Feb. 5, 1704-5, then of Dedham, Mass., says his father lived "about three or four miles" from Waldron's, at Cochecho. Descendants noted in Maine, some as distinguished jurists.

Follett, John. Protest, 1641, and no further mention.

William Follett was taxed 1649 and onward, and had various grants. He married (evidently second wife), July 20, 1671 or 1672, Elizabeth, widow of William Drew. He had at least one son.

Nicholas, mariner, representative to convention, 1689-90. In entries of inward vessels at Portsmouth, Sept. 17, 1692, "Nicholas Follet, com<sup>r</sup> of the Brigantine The Friends Endeavor, of Portsmouth," twenty-five tons, from Barbadoes. Had wife Hannah, who afterwards married Richard Nason, of York, Me. Nason, by will dated July 14, 1694, gave to wife all property of her former husband, Nicholas Follett, and legacies (besides to his own children) to Follett's children, viz., Sarah (Child), Mary (Witham), Nicholas, and Sarah (Meader). Nicholas Follett's son, Nicholas, born Nov. 5, 1677, conveyed land July 1, 1719, to "cozen Nicholas Meder," calling himself heir of William Follett, and mentioning "cozen John Follett of Barbadoes." He married Sept. 12, 1700, Mary Hall, "both of Portsmouth," and left issue.

Philip Follett was taxed at Oyster River, 1671-75. "Abraham Follet's man" taxed 1673. Descendants are still living in Dover and Durham.

Furber, William. Protest, 1641. Came in the "Angel Gabriel," wrecked at Pemaquid. Born in 1614 or 1615. Grants on Dover records. Was dead in 1699, intestate. He had wife Elizabeth, and children:

1. William, born in 1646, died Sept. 14, 1707. He married (second wife), Aug. 13, 1694, Elizabeth, daughter of Capt. John Heard, and widow of the second James Nute; she died Nov. 9, 1705.

2. Jethro, of Dover.

3. Susanna, married May 5, 1664, John Bickford.

4. Elizabeth, married Nov. 9, 1664 (his second wife), the second John Dam.

5. Bridget, married Thomas Bickford.

Descendants are plentiful, successful in business and public life. James T. Furber is now superintendent of the Boston and Maine Railroad. Rev. Daniel L. Furber, D.D., is a Congregational clergyman in Newton, Mass. William L. Furber, an esteemed citizen, represents the family in Dover.

Garland, Peter. No further mention in Dover.

Perhaps the Peter of Boston, 1654. The next Garland in Dover was Jabez, who by wife Dorcas had six children. Thomas B. Garland, late alderman, etc., of Dover, is a descendant, whose son, a graduate of West Point, was an officer in the army. The late Richard Garland, a learned citizen of Barnstead, was of this family.

Haines, Samuel. Protest, 1641. A. M. Haines, Esq., of Galena, Ill., a descendant, has full records.

Hall, John. Protest, 1641. Was sergeant, and of Greenland. Full account in Historical Memoranda, No. 303, Dover Enquirer. He was an ancestor of the March and Peirce families, leaving but one son, Joseph, who left three daughters only. Hon. Joshua W. Peirce, Clement March, and Dr. Hall Jackson, a surgeon of the Revolution, were descendants. This John Hall was not the later John, Dover, 1650, deacon of the First Church, ancestor of Hon. Joshua G. Hall, M.C., of Dover, Col. Daniel Hall, naval officer, etc.

Heard, John. There were two of the name, who have been confounded. John Heard had a lot here in March, 1648-49, but is not taxed in 1648, 1649, or 1650. There are no lists thence till 1657, when a John Heard appears, and he continues.

John Heard, apparently the one who signed Combination, was later of Kittery. Will dated March 3, 1675, "by reason of age, weak of body," proved Feb. 1, 1676-77; mentions wife Isabel; gives portions to grandchildren Mary and Elizabeth (daughters of deceased son James); to three younger granddaughters (children of James also), then under eighteen, viz.: Katherine, Abigail, and Ann; and farm to grandson John, apparently son of the same James. He mentions also daughter-in-law Susanna, mother of the aforesaid grandchildren. His son James was dead before 1676. Her name, given as Susanna in the above will, is given elsewhere (in public records) as Shuah. Before Nov. 5, 1677, she had married Richard Otis, of Dover. Descendants of James married in Dover, which has added to the confusion.

The other John Heard, a shipmaster, had grant in 1652 of the land where Heard's Garrison afterwards stood. He died Jan. 17, 1688-89. His wife was Elizabeth, daughter of Rev. Joseph (not Benjamin) Hull. She died Nov. 30, 1706. Mather speaks of her. The list of their children seems to be:

1. Benjamin, born Feb. 20, 1643-44; married Elizabeth, daughter of the first Thomas Roberts. He was dead in 1703. It is probable he was the Benjamin, "of Dover," who married Ruth (who?), of Salisbury, May 23, 1690, and had three children.

2. William, died before his father; married, but appears to have been childless.

3. Mary, born Jan. 26, 1649-50; married John Ham.

4. Abigail, born Aug. 2, 1651; married Jenkin Jous.

5. Elizabeth, born Sept. 15, 1653; married (1) James Nute, (2) William Furbur.

6. Hannah, born Nov. 22, 1655; not in father's will.

7. John, born Feb. 24, 1658-59; not in father's will.

8. Joseph, born Jan. 4, 1660-61; not in father's will.

9. Samuel, born August 1, 1663; married Experience, daughter of Richard Otis, and left issue.

10. Tristram, born March 4, 1666-67. His will, dated April 18, 1734, was proved June 3d following, and he left issue. Farmer's notes to Belknap say erroneously he was the one killed in 1723; the one killed was his son Tristram.

11. Nathaniel, born Sept. 20, 1668, died April 3, 1700; his tombstone is standing in Dover. His widow Sarah married, April 26, 1703, William Foss.

12. Dorcas, living single in 1687.

Of this latter family was the late Hon. Ezekiel Hurd, judge of the Court of Common Pleas, whose daughter became the wife of Harrison Haley, Esq., who remained on the homestead. Samuel F. Hurd, now superintendent of streets in Dover, John H. Hurd, successful shoe manufacturer, Clarence L. Hurd, and others of this family reside in Dover. The "Heard Garrison" stood in the open lot south of the Bangs house, and part of its premises.

Huggins, Robert. Protest, 1641, as "Huckins," which is now the common form. Had Back River lot in 1642; not taxed 1648. Unless he was the "old Mr. Huckins" killed at Oyster River, July 24, 1696, we do not know who this last can be. He had an only son, James, taxed at Oyster River 1664, and onward, who had a garrison-house, which was captured in August, 1689, when he and most of his party were killed. His widow was recovered by Capt. Church at Androscoggin Fort in September, 1690. The name of but one son is preserved, viz., Robert, who, with his wife, Welthen, June 6, 1698, gave deed as "eldest son and heir of James Huckins," only son and successor of Robert Huckins, deceased." Descendants are numerous. John I. Huckins, of Farmington, elected county commissioner in 1882, is of this family.

Hunt, Bartholomew. Protest, 1641. No further mention in Dover. The Hunt genealogy gives account of descendants in this eminent family.

Jones, William. Protest, 1641. Savage calls him of Portsmouth, 1640. He was of Bloody Point, 1643. At court, Oct. 2, 1644, he was ordered to make public acknowledgment to Elder Starbuck and others "he hath revyled." No further mention, unless he is the one taxed November, 1659. But it is not likely that he jumped all the intermediate tax-lists. The one of 1659 was taxed in 1661 (1660 is lost) and no further. His tax is in the lowest group. See the various Williams in Savage; especially William who married Hannah, daughter of Governor Theophilus Eaton, and sister of Valentine Hill's wife. Hill died about 1660, having extensive interests at Oyster River.

Jenkin Jones was taxed at Cochecho, 1666, and onward. He married Abigail, daughter of John Heard.

Robert Jones was taxed at Cochecho, 1657-62, and disappears.

Stephen Jones was received inhabitant, March 19, 1665-66; married, June 28, 1663, Elizabeth Field. From him descend the Durham Jones family. His son, Capt. Stephen Jones, bravely and successfully defended his garrison-house, overlooking the Shank-ha-sick, in the great attack of 1694. Their descendant, William F. Jones, now lives on the beautiful lands of his ancestor, being the sixth generation of its ownership.

Knollys, Rev. Hanserd, already mentioned.

Laham, Richard, no further mention. The surname is not given by Savage. As we have only a copy made, 1682, we suspect an error for Lahrone. A Richard Laughorne was of Rowley, 1649, died 1669. (See next name.)

Lahrone, Henry, no further mention.

Larkham, Rev. Thomas, already sufficiently mentioned.

Layton, Thomas. Protest, 1641. Was here about 1636, and died here Jan. 22, 1671-72. Will dated Sept. 20, 1671, in which he says he was "aged sixty-nine years or thereabouts." His widow, Joanna, married, July 16, 1673, Conncilor Job Clements. She died Jan. 15, 1703-4, "full of dayes." Children mentioned in Thomas's will, were:

1. Layton, freeman May 15, 1672; married Elizabeth, daughter of Elder Hatevil Nutter, and left issue.

2. Mary, married the second Thomas Roberts.

3. Elizabeth, married Capt. Philip Cromwell.

4. Sarah, single in 1672. Did she marry the second Philip Chesley?

William Layton was received inhabitant Oct. 10, 1636; taxed at Cochecho, 1663 to 1668. Who was he? The William of Kittery is said to have died in 1666.

The Laightons of the Isles of Shoals are believed to be descendants of Thomas, of Dover. John H. Leighton and others are of Dover.

Nancey, Robert. Protest, 1641. Taxed 1649, and appears no more in Dover. (See Savage.) Was of Boston afterwards; married Catherine, daughter of Rev. John Wheelwright, baptized at Bilsby, England, Nov. 4, 1630. He calls Richard Hutchinson "uncle." Wheelwright's second wife was Mary Hutchinson, sister of William, who married Anne Marbury. They had a brother Richard.

Nute, James. Came to Portsmouth in 1631, in the Mason emigration; doubtless of the Tiverton family, England. Taxed 1648 and onward. Land given by him in 1671 to his son is still in possession of descendants. His son James married Elizabeth, daughter of Capt. John and Elizabeth (Hull) Heard, of Dover. A grandson, Capt. Samuel Nute, was a soldier of the Revolution. Paul Nute, great-great-grandson of the emigrant, was a lieutenant in the Revolution, and lived on the old homestead which descended to his grandson, Capt. Thomas Nute.

Alonzo Nute, a wealthy citizen of Farmington, is of this family. Ira W. Nute, a resident, Oliver Nute, farmer, Andrew Nute, Edward F. Nute, etc., are of Dover with other descendants of this prolific family.

Phillips, John. Hatevil Nutter and Edward Starbuck were appointed administrators of his estate July 28, 1642; no relatives. Estate, £17 2*l.*; debts, £17 1*l.* 4*s.*

Pinkham, Richard. Protest, 1641. Tradition says from Isle of Wight. Grants are on record. Was living in 1671. Of his children but three are known,—

1. Richard, married Elizabeth, daughter of the second Thomas Layton, and left issue.

2. John, taxed in 1665; married Rose, daughter of Richard Otis, and had at least nine children.

3. Thomas, taxed at Dover Neck, 1667 and 1668, and then disappears.

Many descendants exist. Lands on Dover Neck are still kept in the family. J. Burleigh Pinkham is manufacturing; Alonzo T. Pinkham, druggist; Daniel Pinkham, in his beautiful home on Dover Neck, and many others are descendants.

Pomfret, William. Protest, 1641. Was town clerk 1647 many years; died in Dover, Aug. 7, 1680. Had many grants, being here in 1639, at least, when he bought of Thomas Johnson. He had a clerky education, showing elegant penmanship, correct English, and some Latin. Often "Pomfret." He had evidently only two daughters who grew to maturity,—

1. Elizabeth, married Thomas Whitehouse, whose son, Pomfret Whitehouse, inherited.

2. Martha, married William Dam, whose son, Pomfret Dam, inherited.

Whitehouse and some Dam families in Dover inherit the blood of this emigrant.

Rawlins, James. The Rollins genealogy is ample. Descendants are in Dover. Hon. E. Ashton Rollins, of Philadelphia, and Senator Edward H. Rollins, Dover, and Charles W. Rollins are of this family; so is also Judge Samuel W. Rollins, of Meredith.

Roberts, Thomas. Protest, 1641. Succeeded Underhill in 1640 as president of the court, and was one of the few called "Mr." in the tax-lists. Bishop's New England Judged speaks well of him. His wife was Rebecca. The tradition that he came with the Hiltons should be abandoned. Will dated Sept. 27, 1673, proved June 30, 1684, mentions:

1. John, born (according to deposition) 1629; married Abigail, daughter of Elder Hatevil Nutter; marshal of the province, 1679. Died Jan. 21, 1694-95, leaving issue.

2. Thomas, born (dep.) 1636; married Mary, daughter of the first Thomas Layton, and left issue, whose list is imperfect.

3. Hester, married John Martyn, "of New Jersey," in 1673.

4. Anna, married James Philbrick, of Hampton.

5. Elizabeth, married Benjamin Heard, of Cochecho.

6. Sarah, married Richard Rich, who had the homestead.

He was ancestor of a numerous posterity. The late Hiram R. Roberts, of Rollinsford; Col. Charles W. Roberts, of Maine; Rev. Oliver A. Roberts, of Salisbury, Mass.; Alonzo Roberts, of Dover Neck, are of this family.

Smith, Bartholomew. Protest, 1641. Back River lot in 1642. No further mention.

George Smith, recorder of Dover, 1646-47, taxed 1648 and 1649. The tradition that he was a relative of the famous Capt. John Smith lacks support. Equally so that he was father of Joseph, who was ancestor of the Durham Smiths.

Joseph Smith was of Oyster River; see a pamphlet genealogy of this family. A descendant writes me that there is no reason to suppose Joseph to be son of George; and that an old paper says that his mother came over with three sons, having previously married a Munday. His descendants have been persons of great influence. Judge Ebenezer Smith, of Durham, who died in 1831, was a descendant.

Starbuck, Edward. Protest, 1641. Born in 1601, is said to have come from Derbyshire. Was "elder" in the church. He was later a leading citizen of Nantucket, and left descendants. He died in Nantucket, Feb. 4, 1696-97, aged eighty-six. Had wife, Katherine, and children:

1. Nathaniel, born 1636; married Mary, daughter of Tristram Coffin, and was of Nantucket. Both were "Friends." He died June 6, 1719; she died Sept. 13, 1717.

2. Dorcas married William Gayer; daughter Demaris married Nathaniel Coffin, and they were ancestors of Admiral Sir Isaac Coffin.

3. Sarah married (1) William Storey, of Dover; (2) Joseph Austin; (3) Humphrey Varney. When William Storey's inventory was entered, his widow is mentioned as having married Joseph Austin. Austin, in his will, speaks of "my brother Peter Coffin." After Sarah's marriage to Varney, Elder Starbuck confirms to "son-in-law Humphrey Varney," "husband of Sarah," land formerly given by him to "son-in-law Joseph Austin." Yet (Register, vii, 128) Varney's marriage, March 2, 1664 [-65], mentions her as Sarah Storer, omitting the intermediate Austin.

4. Abigail married Judge Peter Coffin, of Dover, whose garrison-house stood on the north side of Orchard Street, Dover, about sixty feet back from the Central Street line; this house was taken in the massacre of 1689. Their son Tristram, born Jan. 18, 1665, also had a garrison-house in Dover at that date. Tristram's son Tristram (born about 1691) had daughter Deborah, born Aug. 31, 1738, who died in Dover, July 29, 1837, when the property known as the "Coffin field" (nearly two hundred years in the family) came into the market. Washington Street (from Central) runs through it.

5. Jethro, killed at Nantucket by a cart running on him:

Storer, William. Protest, 1641. Back River lot 8 in 1642, as "Storey." Taxed 1648 to '58 as "Storey;" "widow Storie" taxed 1659. Grants are on record. Inventory entered Nov. 8, 1660, and Joseph Austin (who had married his widow) was appointed administrator, June 27, 1661. Storer is believed (from tradition) to be the son of Augustine Storer, of Exeter Combination, for whom see Wentworth Genealogy. William married, perhaps his second wife, Sarah Starbuck, as ante. His children were:

1. Samuel, born Dec. 29, 1640; died early.

2. Sarah, born June 16, 1642; died early.

3. Hancock, born July 15, 1641.

4. Sarah, born Dec. 13, 1645.

5. Joseph, born Aug. 23, 1648.

6. Benjamin, twin with Joseph, died single.

7. Samuel, born about 1653.

And Savage thinks that Benjamin, of Wells, may have been a son. See Savage for the sons, who went to Wells.

Joseph Storer, of Wells, and Jeremiah Storer conveyed to Samuel Cromwell, of Dover, April 5, 1710, land on Dover Neck, "the antient Possession of our father William Storer." Descendants are in Maine, and the late Rear-Admiral George W. Storer was one.

Swallow, Philip. Protest, 1641, as "Swaddon." No further mention here. Savage says, "Philip, Watertown, servant of Robert Seely, 1630, set free next year on condition of paying £10 to his master; of Kittery 1640." Why "of Kittery 1640," when he signed Dover Combination, 1640?

Teddar, Stephen. Gibbon's letter from Newichawannock, July 13, 1633, speaks of Stephen Kidder as employed there, if we believe the printed copy. In 1642, May 24, Anthony Emery had six acres of land, purchased of Stephen Golder, on Dover side of Newichawannock. Between Teddar, Kidder, and Golder, we are in despair. Neither appears here afterwards.

Underhill, Capt. John. Governor of Dover, 1638-40, which high-sounding title doubtless meant little. Sufficient is said of him above.

Uprouffe, John. Had Back River lot 10 in 1642, as "Newgrove;" in list of marsh lots, 1648, he is called "Ugrove." No further mention, except referred to as of above date in conveyances, where he is called "Newgrove."

Walderne, Richard. Protest, 1641. Of the Massachusetts House. Of him see farther on.

Walderne, William. Protest, 1641. Eldest brother of the major, as see Register, viii, 78; baptized in Aleester, Warwickshire, Oct. 18, 1601. Perhaps came to Dover in 1635 (when the major first came over), perhaps 1637. Was member of Dover first church at its organization, December, 1638. In 1641 one of the four magistrates appointed by Massachusetts, and recorder of court 1641 till his death, being also (late) recorder of Maine. Drowned in river at Kennebunk, September, 1646. Savage says he was "one day" in General Court in 1642, as deputy from Dover, and was deputy in 1646. His business affairs were in confusion long after his death. He owned shares in the Swainscot patent, bought in 1645 of William Whiting. Of his family there is much obscurity.

The following facts appear: William, born 1642 (as by deposition, was taxed in Dover, 1664, etc.), Barefoot's deposition, July 30, 1682, calls Maj. Richard Walderne "uncle" to this William. William was gunsmith in Boston, 1672.

Alexander, elsewhere called a "relation" of the major, was taxed with William (jointly) Cochecho, 1665, and taxed alone 1667. Alexander, by will, June 7, 1676 (inventory, June 14, 1676), then "sojourner" at Great Island (now Newcastle, N. H.), mentions brothers Isaac, William, George, Edward ("in Old England"), and Samuel (apparently in England), and sister Mary (perhaps in England?); also gives legacy to Joan Barker (she be living), of Coventry, which is in the same county with Alcester, and twenty miles distant.

William being a nephew of Maj. Richard, of course all these brothers and this sister were in the same relationship. Whose children were they?

All the brothers of Maj. Richard are known, by record: George, baptized 1603, married only as late as 1635, could not be father of these children, and, besides, his family is on record. Thomas died 1633, apparently s. p., and his death makes him out of the question. Foulke, baptized 1610, was too young for these children, as also was Robert, baptized 1612. The only possible parentage was William, the Dover recorder. Further, it is said that a bill in chancery, London, 1654, supposes that recorder William to be living "in New England, beyond the seas," "having issue Christopher and many other children."

On the other hand, a petition of Richard Scammon, 1666, makes his wife Prudence to be only daughter of recorder William. This seems incompatible with there being a daughter Mary (will of Alexander above), and makes query why Prudence was not mentioned in that will.

There was also a John, taxed in Dover, 1672, having wife Dorothy; perhaps the John of Marblehead, 1673.

If the inconsistencies as to Mary and Prudence were removed, the following would be a conjectural list for William Walderne's family, arranged according to probable order as by tax-lists and depositions:

1. Christopher, mentioned only in chancery paper, as above.
2. John (perhaps), born, as by deposition, in 1624 or 1625.
3. Edward, of Ipswich, 1648, who (as by Savage) early left for England.
4. Mary, apparently went to England.
5. Samuel, in England, 1676.

6. Isaac, of Portsmouth, York, Boston, 1676, a physician.

7. George, taxed in Dover, 1661.

8. William, born about 1642, as by deposition; taxed in Dover, 1664.

9. Alexander, taxed in Dover, 1664; died 1676.

10. Prudence, married Richard Scammon.

Wastell, John. Back River lot 22, in 1642. Does not appear further in Dover. See Savage for John Wastell or Westall, of Connecticut.

Webb, George. Back River lot 6 in 1642. Taxed 1648, and his "house and land" 1659. George Smith administered on his estate in 1651, and conveyed to Oliver Kent premises at Back River. The only other item is this: At court, Aug. 31, 1643, "George Webb presented for living idle like a swine."

Of the forty-two signers of the Combination, descendants of fifteen now bear the name within the old limits of Dover, three others are represented through female lines, and descendants of seven others are known to exist in other places.

Notwithstanding Underhill's signature to the Combination, he continued to scheme for union with Massachusetts. His efforts caused a remonstrance to be forwarded to that government, signed by twenty-five persons, twenty-three (probably twenty-four) of whom had signed the Combination. Of the nineteen other signers of the former paper several are known to have been opposed to the Massachusetts claim. The paper is as follows:

"NORTHAM, 4 1 month [1643] [Dover, N. H.].

"HONOURED SIR:

"Wee the Inhabitants of Northam make bold to trouble you with these few lines certifying you that whereas we suppose Capt: Underhill hath informed you & the rest of you brethren of the Matchethoth bay that we are all willinge voluntarily to submit our selves to your government upon former Attil's propounded, truth it is we doe very well approve of your Judicious wayes & shal be very wifull y<sup>e</sup> please God to enlarge us that we may be free from other engagements & promises wch some of us are oblig'd in to the owners or patentees from whom under under his Mats' Letter Patents we enjoy our free liberty: wch rather as not for present to submit to any other government than that wch we have already enter'd into combination to observe according to the King's Maties' lawes until such time as the owners come over to us wch we suppose will be about three months hence, and thence our propostions considered as the Lord shall direct us we will labor more to satisfi you. But for the proceedings of Caphyne Underhills seeking to undermine us and contrary to his oath & fidelity as we suppose intrusted to him hath went from house to house & for his owne ends by flattery and threatening gotten some hands to a note of their willingness to submit themselves under your government & some of those are men of other combinations, others strangers that have new habitation, to bring his purposes to pass, we doubt not but you are to well acquainted with his stratagemes in plotting his owne designs wch we refer to your grave judgements—some of those that subscribed to his note, have this day utterly protested against their owne act, for he hath rayped such a Mutinee amongst us wch if we take not course for the staying thereof, it maye cause the effusion of blood by reason he hath by his disignes privately rent the combinations as much as in men lyeth, contrary to his act, that is that we should continue in the same Government except an agreement or cause shewed to the contrary in open court agreed on by the Major part.—Thus much we thought good to acquaint you wch we will weigh our cause in equity & conscience & not any way to enforce us to any act whereby we should breake promises or covenant with the patentees or amongst ourselves wch in see doing we should sinne greatly, we should strive greatly. We heartily desire your prayers for us & commit you to the protection of the Almighty at your service to command.

Thomas Larkham, whose name is on the list of the Combination, as well as on that of the protest against the projects of Underhill for union with Massachusetts, had speedily eclipsed Knollys in the estimation of the people, partly, doubtless, by his superior abilities, but partly because he was more in sympathy with the genius of the English Church, while Knollys had grown more rigid and more in sympathy with Massachusetts.

It does not appear that Knollys ceased to be pastor of the church, although Winthrop says that "Knollys gave place to him." They appear to have been in service together, Larkham as "teacher," although without any formal installation. Larkham says, "I found a people in a church-way, & a pastor, and so joynted to them to partake of & submit unto the ordinances of our Lord & Kinge amonge them, according to His will to be administered; and . . . some after received a call to office, viz. to be teacher to the church, and (though not suddainly) yet at length yielded to become so, . . . conceiving that without offence I might pphesie [prophecy] & dispence by the key of charitie, though not by a key ministeriall. . . . So we went on together lovingly a while."

It appears, however, that Larkham soon obtained control, and Knollys, apparently in January, 1641, was temporarily "enjoined silence" by the magistrates.

Larkham also wrote to the Massachusetts authorities a letter dated on "the Sabbath, being the 3d day of the eleventh month,"—i. e., January 3d,—which fixes the year as 1641. In this letter he gives his version of the disturbances between himself and Knollys.

If Larkham's statements are correct, it is evident that Knollys had not abandoned the jargon of the Antinomians. The difficulty between the two was, however, deeper than any quarrel between one or another section of Puritans. Historians have failed to see the inevitable inferences to be drawn from the accounts of these Dover troubles as given by Winthrop and Lechford, or from the character of the settlement.

The original patrons of the Pascataqua settlements were Sir Ferdinando Gorges and Capt. John Mason. But these men were zealous members of the Church of England. The first settler of Dover was Edward Hilton. It is a significant fact that Edward Hilton, a gentleman, a man of ability and integrity, and possessor of wealth, never, save in the act of union for an exigency, held the highest public office under the Massachusetts government.

The drift of his settlement was, of course, not Puritan, nor was it for religious liberty in the least degree. Thomas Wiggin brought in "about thirty" in 1633, including women and children doubtless, "some of whom were of some account for religion," a mild substitute for saying that a portion of them were of Puritanic sympathies. But others followed, such as the influential Richard Wadburne and Francis Champernowne, both of the Established Church, and others chose this river in preference to Massachusetts Bay, out of dislike to the rigidity of the latter. Burdett's success in displacing Capt. Wiggin, the agent of the Puritan Lords Say and Brooke, from the governorship, himself a correspondent of Archbishop Laud, is thus explained. The watchful jealousy of Massachusetts is also thus understood. It was not a mere desire for more territory; but Massachusetts saw its near northern neighbors, Dover, a mixed settlement, but with a preponderance against Puritan strictness, the north of its river openly an Episcopal settlement, and the authorities across the Pascataqua strenuous churchmen.

Of this sentiment in Dover, Larkham took advantage.

A comparison of Winthrop and Lechford shows the truth of this view of the controversy. "He [Larkham] received into the church," says Winthrop, "all that offered themselves, though men notoriously scandalous and ignorant, so they would promise amendment." The difference between the Puritan and the Anglican theory is here evident at a glance: the latter received to the church all who appeared to repent of their sins and believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, the former demanded the laying bare of an inward spiritual experience of the deepest character.

Lechford says, "These two fell out about baptizing children, receiving of members, and burial of the dead." The "receiving of members" is that to which Winthrop alludes. The "baptizing of children,"<sup>1</sup> its significance, the phraseology employed in the administration, the restriction to children of church-members were subjects of the strongest antagonism between Puritan and prelatist. The "burial of the dead," whether the dead should be buried with the majestic liturgy of the church, or laid in the ground as the Puritans buried, without Scripture, psalm, or prayer. The inferences are indisputable that the ecclesiastical troubles in Dover, which meant civil as well as religious, were the result of those two theories of the church.

The troubles soon came to an open issue. It could scarcely be later than March when the two factions appeared in arms. Mr. Knollys, with his adherents, excommunicated Larkham "and some that held with him." Some of the magistrates sided with Larkham, assembled men with the purpose of arresting Underhill, "another of their magistrates and their captain," and bringing him before the court on the charge of endeavoring to place Dover under Massachusetts government. Underhill gathered some forces, and, "expecting help from the Bay," marched towards Larkham's. Knollys, armed with a pistol, was in the front with a Bible upon a staff for an ensign, and "giving forth that their side were Scots and the other English."

The significance of this last expression is decisive. It will be remembered that the canons for liturgical worship in Scotland were published in the earlier part of the year 1637; that on the 23d of July the new liturgy, pressed upon Scotland by the English bishops, was read for the first time in Edinburgh, was resisted by riots on it, and utterly failed of acceptance; that public affairs remained disturbed, Scotland arming, until they eventuated in open hostilities. In the beginning of the year 1639 the English forces moved forward, and soon occupied Berwick. A temporary pacification was announced June 17, 1639. The conflict was renewed in 1640, and that little war, known as "the bishops' war," ended with the action at Newburn-on-Tyne, Aug. 28, 1640, which Charendon calls "that infamous, irreparable rout at Newburn." With this defeat of the English the attempt to establish in Scotland the canons and liturgy of the English Church utterly failed.

The steps of this conflict were known in America. In December, 1640, "they brought us," says Winthrop, "news of the Scots entering into England, and the calling of a Parliament, and the hope of a thorough reformation." The disturbances in Dover were but a few weeks after, and the significance of the names Scot and English, as used by Knollys, becomes apparent. The conflict which was to convulse England had its outer wave in a little obscure settlement in a clearing on the Pascataqua.

The result was in accordance with this fact. Larkham, when Underhill put his men under arms, at once sent to (now) Portsmouth for aid. Francis Williams, then Governor there, was a churchman. He came up with armed men. Gentlemen from the Gorges plantation, of the same character, came over. They kept a guard night and day around Knollys' house, where Underhill also was; called a court, in which Mr. Williams sat as judge; tried Underhill and his companions in arms for riot by forced indictment and jury trial, and on conviction sentenced nine of them to be whipped ("but that was spared"), fined Knollys and Underhill £100 each, and ordered them to leave the plantation.

Underhill and Knollys, suffering for their zeal in behalf of Massachusetts, at once sent to that government a petition for aid. The Governor and Council sent Mr. Bradstreet (one of the magistrates), Rev. Hugh Peter, of Salem, and Rev. Timothy Dalton, of Hampton, to go to Dover, "to endeavor to reconcile them, and if they could not effect that, then to inquire how things stood, and to certify to us." Of this commission the indelitable Hugh Peter, destined afterwards to lose his head for treason, was the moving spirit. Says Lechford,— "Master Peter went from Salem on foot to New Dover, alias Pascataqua, alias Northam, to appease the difference between Master Larkham and Master K. when they had been up in Armes this last winter time. He went by the sending of the Governor, Councill, and Assistants of the Bay, and of the Church of Salem."

The politic result of this mediation was that Larkham was relieved of the church censures, and the Knollys party of their fines and banishment.

The ostensible object of Peter's visit was to reconcile differences. The real object is apparent from a letter of Peter which, although without date, seems clearly to belong to this period, especially as its internal evidence was that it was written while Winthrop was not in office as Governor, and therefore before May. The letter is as follows:

To my honoured brother John Winthrop, sr. Esq., these present, in Boston:
"HONOURED SIR,—These are to accompany Mr. Knollys. What advise I gave at my being there Mr. Wilson can inform you, whose letter I would desire you to read, I being to give an account to them that sent me. Now my earnest request is that his bearer & for I more of his hands may have the liberty of sitting downe in our jurisdiction, hee may [be] so full without doubt, hee is well affeited, you may doe well to heare him at Boston.

"They there are ripe for our Government as will appeare by the note I have sent you. They came to Government and Gospel all over that side on the Country. I conceive that 2 or 3 fit men sent over may doe much good at this conjuncture of things. These will relate how all stands in those parts. Also, your blessing suites."

"I have desired Mr. Endicot to write to your governour. I thinke this worke falls naturally under the care of the Councill. If Mr. Larkham say and hold, how hath promised mee to close with vs, but mole ordio, What are men?"

"H. PETER."

The exact dates of the riots and of Peter's visit can hardly be settled. Larkham's letter of January (the probable date), 1641, implies that the riotous proceedings had not then taken place, while Winthrop's entries clearly show that they were earlier than May. Both Winthrop and Lechford say "last winter." Peter and Dalton started from Dover for Agamenticus, "with one of Agamenticus," and with John Ward, "who was to be entertained for their minister;" "lost their way, and wandered two days and one night without food or fire in the snow and wet." The "snow and wet" could easily be in March or February.

This letter shows plainly the intrigue upon which he was at Pascataqua, of whose success he was sanguine. What motives he applied no records tell us; but events soon showed that his arguments were powerful.

On the 14th of June, 1641, five owners of the Dover and Swainscot patent, in the name of the whole, conveyed to Massachusetts all power of government over the tract embraced in their grant, together with its lands, reserving certain property for themselves. In fact, they had no power of government to convey; they were but a trading and planting corporation.

The five signers of this transfer acted in behalf of all the owners of the patent. In the protest against annexation, dated 4th of March, 1641, the signers mention their expectation that "the owners" were expected to "come over" in about three months; that is, "the owners," being the owners of the patent, who granted land to settlers, not the settlers themselves, who owned land under grant from the patentees. This transfer was actually made three months and a half after the date of the protest, but not one of the owners appear to have "come over." Wyllys was then Deputy Governor of Connecticut, and lived, as well as Whiting, at Hartford; Saltonstall (brother of Sir Richard) was a resident of Watertown; Holyoke was of Lynn; and Makepeace was of Dorchester. Three of these five signers, therefore, were citizens of Massachusetts, and no owner came from abroad or signed any transfer. Unless the project had been formed during the preceding year, no authority from England could have been possessed by these signers. The probability is that it was a plan devised to meet an exigency in the progress of the territorial extension.

In this transfer it is noticeable that the patentees conveyed "power of jurisdiction or government of the said people." What prompted them to do this is beyond explanation. First, such a power in themselves was not capable of being deputed, and, secondly, they had no such power in themselves. The patent under which they held lands will be searched in vain to find the slightest allusion to power of government. The consequence was a fraudulent assumption of power which they had never attempted to exercise. When the heirs of Mason, whose claim antedated the Dover patent and covered its whole territory, were endeavoring to secure their rights, their own counsel admitted that they had no right of government. The conveyance, as to government, was an arrogant usurpation; but it answered its purpose possibly as one of the factors making the Massachusetts title, perhaps in bringing some pressure to bear upon the people, whose protest had referred to their attachment to the patentees, perhaps wisely to guard against any possible complaint from the patentees. The Massachusetts act of annexation drops it out without even an allusion. Its real practical effect was to convey the title to lands not reserved, and this it accomplished.

It was desirable, perhaps indispensable, with the Masonian claim hanging like a heavy cloud on the northern horizon, that the people of the Pascataqua should come willingly into this extension. Hugh Peter's words were heeded: "I conceive that 2 or 3 fit men sent over may doe much good at this confluence of things." The court, June, 1641, ordered commissioners to be sent to Pascataqua. The Governor appointed, 8th July, Humphrey, Bradstreet, Wiggint, and Synonds. Lechford says that Hugh Peter went also, a "second time," for "appeasing" the old differences there, being commissioner to these gentlemen. Winthrop says that "Mr. Humphrey, Mr. Peter, and Mr. Dalton had been sent before [the commission] to understand the minds of the people, to reconcile some differences between them, and to prepare them," which doubtless refers to Peter's second visit in 1641, not long before his departure (3d August, 1641) for England, where he finally lost his head for treason.

The consent of the people was undoubtedly obtained, as well as of the plantation at the mouth of the Pascataqua as of Dover. But no vote of the people has been preserved. What induced the Episcopal settlement at the river's mouth to consent does not appear, neither is it within my object. The people of Dover were undoubtedly tired of the confusions among them, and at last came to welcome a strong hand to control the discordant elements, especially as that hand was constantly threatening a weak plantation with a claim which could be made effectual by overwhelming forces. What especial arguments were used by Hugh Peter are unknown. Edward Hilton, we know, was guaranteed perpetual freedom from all province taxes. Concessions were made to the towns. They were never to be taxed for any purposes but those arising among themselves, and the reply of Massachusetts in 1676 to the complaint of Mason and Gorges of the usurpation by Massachusetts says that "never was any levy laid upon them for the public treasury." The Pascataqua people were to have their own courts. No soldiers were ever to be drawn out of the town except by their own consent. The towns were guaranteed all usual town privileges, which carried with it the right to sell or grant lands within their limits, and, greatest of all, the law that only church-members could be voters was waived in their behalf, although it does not appear that they could send deputies other than church-members.

The vote of Massachusetts extending its jurisdiction was as follows:

"By the GENERAL COURT,

"It is now ordered By the General Court holden at Boston the 9th of the 8th mo. 1641, and with the Consent of the Inhabitants of the — — — of Pascataway as followeth.

"Inprimis that henceforward the sayd People Inhabitants there ar and shall be Accepted and Reported under the government of the Massachusetts as the Rest of the Inhabitants within the sayd Jurisdiction and also that they shall have the same order and way of Administration of Justice and way of keeping of Courte as is Established at Ipswich and Salem. Also they shall be Exempted from all publicke charges other than those that shall arise Among themselves or from any occasion or contriv that may be Taken To procure their owne proper good or benefit. Also they shall enjoy all such lawfull liberties of fishing, planting, falling timber as formerly they have enjoyed In the sayd River.

"Mr Symon Bradstreet Mr Israhel Stoughton Mr Samewell Simons Mr William Tinge Mr Frances Wilymes and Mr Edward Hilton or anie power of them when of Mr. Broadstreet or Mr. Stoughton to be one, those shall have the same power that the quarter Courts at Sullum and Ipswich have. Also the Inhabitants there are allowed to send two deputies from the hole River to the Court at Boston, also Mr. Broadstreet Mr. Stoughton and three of the commissioners shall have power at the Court at Piscataway to appoint two or three to Joine with Mr. Williams and Mr. Hilton to govern the people as the magistrates here till the next General Court take further order."

It will be seen that Massachusetts rested its title upon two points,—first, its claim that its patent covered the Piscataqua, which was afterwards decided (in 1677) by the lords chief justices in England to be invalid, a decision confirmed by the king in council; and secondly, and subordinate, the consent of the people, of which it may be said that under the laws of England it was equally invalid. The two, however, served the purpose, and the Piscataqua towns were a part of Massachusetts for nearly forty years. A strong power preserved order, and it is but just to say, however that power was acquired, that it respected the rights of the people, allowed their intense democracy all the privileges of self-government, and was never slow to put forth its strength for the protection of the settlements against a barbarous enemy. For not a few years even the Speaker of the Massachusetts Assembly was the deputy from Dover. This wise policy so conciliated a watchful and sometimes jealous people that the larger part became well contented, and received with reluctance the mandate which finally made New Hampshire a royal province.

To carry into effect the annexation the commissioners appointed by the General Court came to Dover, and appointed as magistrates Thomas Wiggin, Thomas Wannerton, Ambrose Gibbons, and William Walderne to act with Mr. Williams and Mr. Hilton. This constituted the Court of Associates, with jurisdiction in cases under twenty pounds in value, and from this court there was power of appeal to the Court of Assistants. The Court of Associates at first could not sit without the presence of an assistant, so called, in reality a presiding judge, but the inconvenience of this requirement in the Piscataqua led, in September, 1642, to permission to act without such judge. The associates continued for some time to be appointed by the General Court. The towns were subsequently authorized to elect associates by popular vote. An inferior court existed in each town, "commissioners for small causes" being elected by the people, with jurisdiction in cases under twenty shillings in value. Dover and Portsmouth were at first annexed to the jurisdiction of the courts at Ipswich, but 10th May, 1643, the county of Norfolk was created, including Salisbury, Haverhill, Hampton, Exeter, Portsmouth, and Dover, the shire town being Salisbury;<sup>1</sup> but Dover and Portsmouth always had distinct courts held in these two towns once or twice a year, and the records frequently speak of the "county of Dover and Portsmouth."<sup>2</sup> This court, in 1642, was authorized to administer the "freeman's oath." It is noticeable that Thomas Wiggin, appointed in 1650, was the only assistant ever selected from the Piscataqua.

The concession that church membership was not necessary to "freemen," that is, to persons invested with full rights of citizenship, inclusive of voting at elections, was made at the General Court of September, 1642. The same court voted that "Northam" (the then name of Dover) should have the "same liberty which other towns have." This carried with it the right to grant or sell unoccupied lands or standing timber and controlling fisheries, all of which rights Dover used freely. This vote was accompanied by a statement that "Wee thinke we are bound to defend their right, according to of agreement with Mr. Whiting and his company, so as nothing bee done to the prejudice of Mr. Whiting and company, till the matter bee decided."

The matter of sales of lands was still further completed by a vote of the General Court, May 6, 1646, "Y<sup>e</sup> Dover hath the same power of recording sales of land as Ipswich hath, and y<sup>e</sup> Wm. Walderne be recorder there till y<sup>e</sup> Court take further order therein."

How did it happen that the Piscataqua people consented to submit to Massachusetts? We have seen that the predominant sentiment at Dover was a mild churchman sympathy, and that of Portsmouth an open and strenuous Episcopacy. On the Piscataqua were exiles from Massachusetts, who could not regard the extension of that power over them with any contentment. It was only in the March previous that a majority of the people of Dover had protested against the proposed union.

No document exists to explain the change. But facts can hint. The Dover people at least were so troubled by the contests among themselves which had culminated after that protest that the need of a strong and controlling power was evident. So far as any reliance upon Mason was concerned,—he was dead, his heir was a minor, his widow without power. So far as England was concerned,—the reign of the Long Parliament had begun. There was absolutely no power and no friendship to which the Piscataqua could appeal for aid or defense should Massachusetts determine to take its long-threatened possession. The settlements, therefore, made the best terms possible, to which Massachusetts in fact granted everything in exchange for the mere title of sovereignty; and, to all appearance, inducements were held out by the leading men, some of whom, gracefully yielding, found places of trust and honor.

now remaining. He was also recorder of Maine. After his untimely death, in September, 1646, by drowning, in the Kennebec River, George Smyth was appointed recorder at Dover, Nov. 4, 1646. None of his records remain, and William Pomfret, elected town clerk Nov. 1, 1647, was directed by the town to "record the lands . . . as hath bin given heretofore to pttickler persons, or that shall be hereafter."

Names and Boundaries.—The earliest name of any part of Dover, so far as known, is that of Dover Point, given in the Swamscot patent, "Wecanacohant." The now central part of Dover took its name from the falls, "Cochecho," meaning the "rapid, foaming water." Dover Point, while Hilton controlled it, was known in English as "Hilton's Point." For a time under Wiggin an old map marks it "Bristol," from Bristol, the place where the owners principally lived. Before 1639 it had received the name of "Dover," for what reason has not yet appeared. Before January, 1611, it was "Northam," from the place where Rev. Thomas Larkham had been settled. But before May, 1643, it was again "Dover," the name which the present city has always since retained, yet the name of Northam lingered in traces for some years.

The boundaries of Dover (not including the Newington side) were not given in the patent. In the union with Massachusetts, in 1641, perhaps some northern boundaries were mentioned, but no record of such is found. It is probable that the boundaries were as settled in 1652, except that it is known that Bloody Point (Newington) was assigned to Portsmouth. This was not pleasing to Bloody Point, and in 1643 the inhabitants remonstrated and petitioned to be restored to Dover. The signers were James Johnson, Thomas Canning, Thomas Fursen, William Fray, William Jones, Thomas Trickey, John Godard, Henry Langstaffe, John Fayer, Oliver Trimmings, Philip Lewis, Roderick [illegible]. Those starred made their marks.

The result of this petition was an order restoring all the marsh and meadow on Great Bay to Dover, with four hundred acres of upland.

Upon the 8th 7th mo., 1652, Massachusetts appointed certain men to "settle the limits" of Dover. It was done as follows: "That the utmost Bound on the west is a Creeke on the east sied of Lamprill River, and from the end of that Creeke to Lamprill River first fall, and so from the first on a west and by north line six miles, and from newchawick first fall one A north and by est line fower miles from a Creek next Belowe Thomas Canne his house to a Cartaine Cove near the mouth of the Great Bay called the hogstey Cove, and all the marsh and meadowe ground lying and butting on the Great Bay with Conveniente upland to sell their hey."

On the 19th of October following it was ordered that "the northern bounds of Dover shall extend from the first fall of newchawick River upon a north and by west line fower miles."

Between Dover and Exeter, "agreed that the line formerly laid out shall stand, they takinge the pointe from the middle of the bridge and the first fall on the Lamprill River and soe to Runne six miles west by north." In 1654 the middle of the river "newchawacke" was determined to be the dividing line between Dover and Kittery.—Kittery then including Eliot and the Berwicks.

Original Dover, therefore, included the present city of Dover, Somersworth, Rollinsford, Durham, Madbury, Lee, Newington, and perhaps part of Greenland. Its various divisions may here be mentioned.

In 1669 the people of Oyster River (now Durham) petitioned to be set off, saying they were "two hundred and twenty souls, near fiftie families, seventy and odd souldiers." It was signed by John Brickford and thirty-eight others.

No success was had. In 1695 they prayed for incorporation as a parish, signed by John Woodman (ancestor of the late John S. Woodman, professor in Dartmouth College) and fifty-two others. Again the effort was unsuccessful.

July 16, 1713, on petition of George Hmmtress and fifty-two others, Newington (the old Bloody Point) was separated from Dover, its first meeting being held Aug. 6, 1713.

May 15, 1732, Durham was incorporated, taking the now Durham, Lee, and part of Madbury.

In 1729, Samuel Roberts and sixty-four others petitioned to have Somersworth set off. This resulted in the establishment of a parish, which was finally made a town, April 22, 1754.

May 10, 1743, Zachariah Pitman and sixty others, of the present Madbury, "the westerly part of the town of Dover, and the northerly part of Durham," petitioned to have that territory set off, which was done May 31, 1755, as a parish, and May 26, 1768, as a town. Lee was separated from Durham Jan. 17, 1766, and Rollinsford from Somersworth July 3, 1849; a small portion of the lower eastern end of Rollinsford was restored to Dover in 1879.

Early Records.—The earliest extant records of Dover are in the year 1647. A few land records are evidently results of grants of 1636 and 1637. We give some of the earliest:

CHAPTER CXIII.

LUMBER BUSINESS.

THE first industry of Dover was the catching and curing of fish for the English market, with the soon added trade with Indians for skins. The latter was extensively carried on by Maj. Richard Walderne, at his frontier post at Cochecho. The lumber business early assumed large proportions. Maj. Walderne began the manufacture of lumber at his mill on Cochecho Falls certainly as early as 1642, and he continued it through life. The lumber was taken to Portsmouth by the river on rafts, and thence transported very largely to the West Indies in exchange for the products of those islands. The extensive forests became a source of wealth, and the various water-falls were rapidly improved.

The town made grants of mill-sites, with the right to cut timber on specified tracts, the occupants paying annual rents for the rights thus conferred. These rents were set apart for the support of the ministry. We notice reference to these rents as late as the year 1703, and later we have not yet investigated.

The falls at Cochecho were doubtless occupied very early. The first saw-mill was on the south side of the river, and was called "old" in a conveyance of 1649. The second was on the north side, about 1618. The first grant of mill-site is not on record, unless it be included, as probably it was, in the conveyance of land in 1642. The successive dates of occupation, in order of time, would be as follows:

Cochecho, south side, prior to 1643.

Lamprey River, Dec. 27, 1647.

Cochecho, north side, Dec. 12, 1648.

Bellamy, Oct. 23, 1649.

Oyster River, Nov. 19, 1649.

Newichawannock, July 1, 1650.

Cochecho, second fall, July 4, 1650.

Fresh Creek, Dec. 5, 1652.

Johnson's Creek, Dec. 5, 1652.

Little John's Creek, Dec. 5, 1652.

CHAPTER CXIV.

INDIAN WARS.

Forty years had passed away since Waldron settled at Cochecho; in these the Indians and the colonists had lived in peace. This was now to be changed. Men should go to their fields armed, suspecting a foe behind every tree. Families should crowd into close garrison-houses for the long summers and roam in the forests only when the snows of winter protected them from savage attacks. They should worship in the same humble edifice where they had weekly met, but the house of God should be within a fortress, and sentinels should pace in its inclosure.

In 1675 the colonists on Dover Point were able to defend themselves with comparative ease. The beautiful swell of land on which they dwelt was made a peninsula by the Bellamy, the Newichawannock, and the Cochecho, which seeming at first glance to offer easy access by canoes was yet defended by the freedom with which the eye could sweep the waters in every direction. The inhabitants were numerous also. This territory was seldom called upon to defend itself therefore, and it may be that it was guarded in later years by a separate treaty, which tradition (for the honor of our ancestors we hope truly) says was made by the inhabitants of Dover Neck.

But at Cochecho the forty families which had gathered, some near, some remote, around the lower falls, constituted a frontier settlement. The forests above them stretched away to Canada, alive with Indians, who knew every path in the forest, who were skilled in the use of fire-arms through the indiscreet bounties which Dover itself had offered, and who had many a cause for hatred to the whites. No inhabitant, however, deserted his home. They were, indeed, partially prepared; suspicious of Indian friendship had been raised some years previous; in 1667 the bulwark was raised around their plain house of worship, and doubtless the garrison-houses which were so common on the actual breaking out of warfare were then erected.

The first general war with the Indians commenced in 1675. For several years previous only the fear which the power of the whites excited and the influence of a few old men had kept them quiet; love had little to do with it. The cordiality which had welcomed the settlers ended long previous; increasing encroachments on Indian hunting-grounds to supply an increasing population excited their alarm; the contempt openly expressed for the Indians grated harshly upon their sensitive feelings; the over-reaching habits of traders who acted upon the principle that it was a praiseworthy deed to cheat an Indian exasperated their sense of justice. While laws pretending to guard their rights were as inoper-ative as laws not sustained by public opinion must ever be, and cases of individual hardship and cruelty were not unknown, it is only wonderful how they were kept inactive so long. But they were brooding over real and fancied wrongs; and when the impetuous young men of Philip of Pokanoket forced him into a war in which he saw fore-shadowed only the destruction of his people, it needs not the theory of a general conspiracy to account for the fires which blazed all along the frontier. Each town had its own ground for enmity, and the torch which the Wampanoags applied to Swauzey was the signal for a hoped-for but scarcely planned war, which in twenty days was felt at the northeastern extremity of the colonies.

As soon as the first blow was struck the Massachusetts government prepared for general defense. The towns on the Pascatuqua were especially exposed; their defense was confided to Waldern, who in 1675 was appointed commander of the militia of those towns with the rank of major, which was conferred upon him either then or just previous.

All that could be done in this vicinity was to act entirely upon the defensive. The account, therefore, of the strife around the Pascatuqua is but the history of a series of petty and irritating attacks which were made and ended in a night.

The first bloodshed was at Oyster River, in September, 1675, when the Indians "burned two houses belonging to two persons named Chesley, killed two men in a canoe, and carried away two captives" (both of whom made their escape soon after). One person (Goodman Robinson, of Exeter) was killed on the road from that place to Hampton, and one (Charles Ranlet) captured, but he soon escaped. A few days after the house of Richard Tozer, at Newichawannock, was attacked, where thirteen out of fifteen women and children were saved by the devotion of a young girl eighteen years old; she saw the enemy coming, shut the door, and held it until they cut it to pieces with their hatchets; as they entered they struck her to the floor, left her for dead, and went in pursuit of the fugitives, whom the heroic girl had given an opportunity for escape; she herself entirely recovered, yet the heroine's name at least ought to have been preserved. Some pursuit was attempted when some houses had been burned and some grain destroyed, but it met with no success; immediately afterwards five or six houses were burnt at Oyster River, and two persons (William Roberts and his son-in-law) were killed. In such a tantalizing kind of warfare the force under the command of Waldern could not be brought to bear effectively in any one point; chafed as he was, he was obliged to content himself with being always on the alert, and ready to give aid where it was needed. Some twenty young men, however, mainly of Dover, obtained permission of him to follow the trail of a party, but their attempt met with no success, except that they killed two out of a party of five Indians whom they accidentally discovered near a deserted house.

A letter dated 25th September, 1675, from Walderne, is of great historical value; published in the New England Hist. Gen. Register.

The whole country was now aroused; the labors of the farm and the forest were suspended, and the inhabitants were crowded into garrison-houses, the heavy timber walls of which gave them the aspect and security of fortresses. In this condition they did not forget their ancestry, and the 7th of October was a day of fasting and prayer.

On the 16th of October Salmon Falls was again attacked. Lieut. Roger Plaisted sent out seven men from his garrison to make discovery of the position of the enemy, all of whom were cut off. Venturing out the next day with twenty men to bury the dead, he himself was killed. Maj. Charles Frost, of Sturgeon Creek (who was under Walderne's command), came to Newichawanoek the day following, but the enemy had retreated. His own house was soon after attacked, and was bravely defended. Frustrated in this attempt the Indians committed all possible devastation along the river until opposite Portsmouth, when they were dispersed by the firing of cannon, and were pursued with so much energy that they were forced to abandon their plunder to secure their own safety. These continued assaults kept the inhabitants in alarm; but the severity of the following winter aided the colonists more than their defenses; for the Indians, pinched by famine, were forced to sue for peace, and applied to Maj. Walderne for his mediation. A peace was concluded at Cochecho with the whole body of Eastern Indians, 3d of July, 1676, Walderne, Shapleigh, and Daniel signing the treaty in behalf of the whites. A copy of this paper is printed in Drake's Book of the Indians, p. 699. But this peace was short-lived. The death of Philip in August, 1676, instead of ending the difficulties, as it was hoped it would, only increased them; for some of his allies, fearing their total extermination now that the Massachusetts government, freed of its greatest enemy, could turn its attention entirely to them, fled to their brethren of Penacook, Ossipee, and Pequawket. The Penacooks had not been engaged in the late disturbances; those of Ossipee and Pequawket had made peace. Some of the southern Indians also fled to the Kennebec. It was for the interest of these refugees to excite the tribes to renewed war, both for their own safety and to gratify their earnest desire of revenge for their own defeat. Troubles were excited by these means, and the government, forced to engage again in hostilities, ordered two companies thither under the command of Capt. Joseph Syll and Capt. William Hathorne. Dover was in their line of march, and on the 6th of September they arrived at Cochecho. It was most unfortunate.

There were gathered at Cochecho some four hundred Indians; for though the war had again broken out on the Kennebec, there was peace on the Pascataqua. Of these, two hundred were refugees, who had fled thither for protection. All of them were on terms of peace with Maj. Walderne, and considered themselves as perfectly safe. But the Massachusetts government had ordered their troops to seize all southern Indians wherever they might be found. In obedience to these orders Capts. Syll and Hathorne told Maj. Walderne that they must seize these Indians by force. The major dissuaded them from this purpose, well knowing the bloodshed that would follow such an attempt, and contrived a stratagem to accomplish the purpose. He proposed to the Indians to have a sham fight the next day; they agreed to it; the Indians formed one party, and the troops of Walderne (including those under Capt. Frost, of Kittery), with the two companies, formed the other. In the midst of their fight the whites suddenly surrounded the whole body of Indians and made them prisoners, almost without exception, before the Indians were aware of the intended deception. The captives were disarmed immediately; the southern Indians present were sent to Boston, the others were set at liberty. Of those sent to Boston some five or six were hung for past offenses, and the remainder sold into slavery.

By those who recognize the necessity of unqualified military obedience this act is commended. This was the view of Maj. Walderne. It is said, and probably with truth, that he was opposed to the affair, both on the ground of policy and of honor; but the orders of the government were imperative, and he would not set the example of insubordination. He well knew that he was exposing himself to the hatred of a people who never forgave an injury, but he never feared an enemy. The Indians never forgave him; they did not understand why they should be punished for acts of open warfare committed in the south when peace had been made at the north. They could not comprehend the policy which treated them as rebels who were born free; and when some who were sold into slavery escaped and returned to the woods of the Cochecho, they hoarded up their vengeance until the bloody morning of the 28th of June, 1689.

The companies of Capts. Syll and Hathorne passed on to the east, taking with them a reinforcement from Walderne's men. But the eastern settlements had been generally destroyed or deserted, and they returned from their fruitless expedition to Pascataqua. Some information led them to march to the Ossipee Ponds on the 1st of November, but finding no sign of an enemy, they returned to Newichawanoek within nine days after their departure.

The following letter will explain the state of affairs at the time of its date:

It seems little available to maintain ought in ye More Eastern places yt are already conquered, unless there be several Garrisons made & kept with provision & Ammunition & what may be suitable for a Recruit upon all Occasions, wch to do (at least ye Winter) cannot yt ye profit will amend for ye charge. Sure we are yt ourselves (yt is ye County of Northfolk wch Dover & Portsmouth) are so far from being capable of Sparring any forces for yt Expedition yt we find ourselves so thinned & weakened by those yt are out already yt there is nothing but ye singular Providence of God hath presented on being utterly run down. The Enemy observes or Motion & knows or strength (weakness rather) betw yn we are willing hee should & Plaudly had been with us this had not ye Highest Power ruled him. And that Hauer-hill, Exeter, &c are in like predicament with Dover &c seems apparent, & hence as incapable of sparing Men. In time there is an Army out in Yorkshire wch will doubtless doe what may be done, yet there is room enough for ye Enemy to slip by them undetected, & if so, what a Condition we are in is evident. Our own men are not enough to maintain or own places, if any Assault be made & yet many of o<sup>ur</sup>s are now on the other side of the Pascatqua River. We expect an Onsett in one place or other every day. A can expect no Relief from those yt are so far from home. If it should be thought meet yt all ye Men yt are come to us & other parts ——— from ye deserted & unguarded Eastern Country should be ordered to ye Places yt are left on their own side of ye River, yt so o<sup>ur</sup>s may be recalled to their several Towns, it might possibly be not unavailable to ye End. Especially if with all some Indians might be ordered to those parts to be upon a perpetual Scout from place to place. We desira not a lessening or discounting of ye Army who rather need strengthening & Incomuting, for we verily thank yt if by ye good Hand of Providence ye Army had not been there, all ye Partison ye other side of ye River had been possed by the Enemy & perhaps ourselves too ere ye Time. But what we aim at is that ourselves also may be put into a Capacity to defend ourselves. We are apt to fear we have been too bold with your Honors, but we are sure our Intentions are good, & our Condition very bad except ye Lord of Hosts appear for us speedily, & we would be found in ye Use of Means, commending our Case to him yt is able to protect in ye Use of Means, commending in order therunto, & Remain

The war was ended for a time by a treaty between the whites and Penobscots, concluded on the 6th of September, Mogg having been deputed to act for the Indians, and agreeing to articles of peace at Boston, whither he had been sent from Pascatqua. These articles were afterwards ratified by Madokawando. Vessels were therefore sent to the Penobscot, to procure the release of captives, Mogg being still retained as a hostage. Some few captives were obtained, but Mogg escaped, and his treacherous purposes were soon displayed. It was soon after discovered also that Narragansett Indians were still scattered among those of the east; three of them were decoyed into the wigwams of Cochecho and were slain, the cut of their hair betraying them. Such circumstances convinced the colonists that the peace would be of very short continuance, and it was judged proper for the whites to strike the first blow. The Bay government determined upon a winter expedition.

Four hundred men were equipped (including sixty Natick Indians), and were dispatched for the eastward, under the command of Maj. Walden, the expedition sailing in the first week of February, 1677, after a day of fasting and prayer. Here follows his instructions:

"Instructions for Major Rich. Walden.

"You shall repaire to Blacke point with the 60 soldiers under capt

"If you fail in this designe you shall assay by all means in your power to disturb & destroy the enemy, unless you have such overtures from them as may give some competent assurance that an honorable & safe peace may be concluded with them.—wherein you must avoid all trifling & delays & with all possible speed make a dispatch of the affaire not trusting them without first delivery of all the Captives and vessels in their hands.

"If you should in conclusion, find it necessary to leave a garrison in Kinnelock we must leave it to your discretion.

"You shall use utmost expedition as winds & other advantages will permit, lest ye season be lost and changes come without profit.

This expedition proved fruitless. But few events in it are worthy of remembrance. A parley at Casco was attended with no important result. Another parley was held at the mouth of the Kennebec. It was mutually agreed to lay aside arms and negotiate for the ransom of prisoners. The Indians demanded twelve beavers-kins for each, with some good liquor, but only three captives could be obtained. Another parley was proposed, when Walderne, Frost, and three others landed under a mutual promise that no weapons should be worn on either side. But Walderne espied the point of a lance under a board, and searching further found other weapons, and taking and brandishing one towards them, exclaimed, "Perfidious wretches! you intended to get our goods and then kill us, did you?" They were thunderstruck, yet one more daring than the rest seized the weapon and strove to wrest it from Walderne's hand. Capt. Frost laid hold of Megunnaway, one of the barbarous murderers of Thomas Brackett and neighbors, and dragged him into his vessel. Meanwhile an athletic squaw caught up a bundle of guns and ran for the woods. At that instant a reinforcement arrived from the vessels, when the Indians scattered in all directions, pursued by the soldiers. In this affray Sagamore Maltahux and an old Powow and five other Indians were killed, five were capsized in a canoe and drowned, and five others were captured. One thousand pounds of beef were taken, and some other booty. Megunnaway was shot. Two more Indians were killed at Arrowsick Island. The expedition returned to Boston on the 11th of March without the loss of a man.

After this expedition was ended the major returned home and busied himself with the duties of his charge there. Though the war continued a year longer, but little took place about Dover. But one instance of alarm is recorded as having occurred in its immediate vicinity during the year. Some time in March the presence of hostile Indians in the woods near Cochecho was discovered, and Walderne sent out eight of his Indians, of whom Blind Will was one, to obtain information. These were all surprized by a company of Mohawks, who, nominally in alliance with the English, spared neither friend nor foe. Two or three of the scouting party escaped; the others were killed or taken; Blind Will was dragged away by his hair, and being wounded, perished on a neck of land formed at the junction of the Singlar and Cochecho Rivers, which was long called "Blind Will's Neck." It was first thought that the death of Blind Will was fortunate, but the result proved otherwise, for the friendly Indians became suspicious that the Mohawks were engaged to destroy rather than assist them. Whittier's poem of "Blind Will" was based upon this occurrence.

The following letter gives us some further information:

In the spring of the year 1678 a peace was concluded at Casco, Maj. Shapleigh, of Kittery, Capt. Francis Champemnon and Mr. Fryer, of Portsmouth, acting for the whites. The following paper has reference to this matter:

"9th of March 77."

By the terms of this treaty the captives were restored and the deserted settlements permitted to be reoccupied, the whites paying one peck of corn annually for each family as an acknowledgment to the Indians for the possession of the lands. Thus a tedious and distressing war was ended by a disgraceful peace. But it allowed the people of Dover to cultivate their lands and use their mills in safety.

For eleven years there was profound peace upon the Pascataqua and its branches. At Cochecho the former habits of trade were revived and whites and Indians mingled freely.

Means of safety were not neglected however. Seven garrison-houses were still preserved, into which the neighboring families gathered at night. Walderne's, Heard's, Otis', and Paine's stood upon the north side of the river; those of the Coffins, father and son, and Gerrish's were upon the south.

The sites of these several garrisons were as follows: Walderne's, a little north of the river, on the lot (open in 1882) now bounded by First, Second, and Central Streets. Otis's was on the brow west of Franklin Street, perhaps three hundred feet from that street, and on the southerly edge of Milk Street. Heard's was in the open space adjoining the Bangs mansion on the south. The elder Coffin's was on high land (now cut down) exactly back of Varney's Block, and about sixty feet from the line of Central Street. The younger Coffin's is not known, but it is supposed to have been near the residence of the late Governor

Martin. Paine's was on the east side of Portland Street, the site being partly on the house lot of the late James B. Varney. Gerrish's is not known, but must have been near Bellany Falls, where the Gerrishes had mills. Paine's and Gerrish's garrisons do not appear to have been molested, and we know of their existence principally from allusions in letters. The timber walls around all were impregnable by open attacks, and their gates were well secured by bolts and bars.

The Indians who were captured at the sham fight in 1677 had never forgiven Walderne for his share in that event. Some of them who had been destined to slavery, after finding no purchasers among the nations to whom they were offered, and after having been left at Tangier, had succeeded in returning home. These had cherished a relentless thirst for revenge. The Pennacooks, it is true, had no such reasons for hostility, for though their sachem and a hundred others were captured on that occasion, they were immediately released, but they regarded his conduct as a breach of faith worthy of punishment. The memory of old wrongs also was revived, and when Kankamagns, who imagined himself ill treated, had fled in 1686 to the Androscoggin for safety from the Mohawks, who, nominally allies to the whites, yet spared neither friend nor foe, his dissatisfaction was doubtless strengthened by the emissaries of Baron de St. Castin, the Frenchman who lived in half-feeudal state on the banks of the Penobscot. Wanaluset, son of the venerable Passaconaway, had always remembered his father's dying charge to live at peace with the whites, but Kankamagns, sachem of the Pennacooks, formed a league with the Pequawkets and the remnant of the fugitives to gratify their desire for revenge, and aided by Mesandowit, a sachem second in authority to himself, prepared for an attack upon Cochecho.

Without the knowledge of any preconcerted plan, the people of Dover, in June, became suspicious of Indian friendship. Larger numbers of Indians seemed gathering than was usual for purposes of trade. Many strange faces were among them, whose scrutiny of the defenses of the place excited notice. Walderne, however, could not be convinced of danger. Some of the people came to him with their fears. "Go plant your pumpkins," said he merrily; "I will tell you when the Indians will break out." A day or two previous to the time decided upon some squaws endeavored to alarm the whites by vague intimations of danger. Thus one of them repeatedly recited the words,—

"O Major Walderne, you great sagamore, What will you do, Indians at your door?"

but she was not understood until the transactions themselves had given only too vivid a meaning to her words. On the evening of the 27th a young man told him that the town was full of Indians, and that the people were much alarmed. "I know the Indians very well, and there is no danger," was the reply. Long experience had made him presumptuous. But though Maj. Walderne was so fatally confident, information of the expected attack had already been sent to the Massachusetts government by Maj. Heuchman, of Chelmsford, in a letter of which the following is a copy:

"Hon'd Sir—This day, two Indians came from Pennasook, viz: Job Marmessand and Peter Morkaming, who report that damage will undoubtedly be done within a few days at Piscataqua, and that Major Waldron, in part of it is threatened, and that Talmatt fears that mischief will quickly be done at Dunstable. The Indians can give a more particular account to your honor. They say, if damage be done, the blame shall not be on them, having given a faithful account of what they hear; and are upon that report moved to leave their habitation and come at Pennasook. Sir, I was very loth to trouble you and to expose myself to the censure and derision of some of the confident people, that would pretend to make sport with what I send down by Capt. Tom (alias Thomas Ukpaakassumum).

"I am constrained from a sense of my duty, and from love to my countrymen, to give the information as above. So with my humble services to your honor, and prayers for the safety of an endangered people—

"I am, sir, your humble servant,

"THO. HINCHMAN.

"June 22, 1689."

Mr. Danforth communicated the information to Governor Bradstreet, who, with the Council, ordered a messenger to Cochecho with the following:

"Honord Sir,

"The Governour and Council having this day received a Letter from Major Heuchman of Chelmsford, that some Indians are come into them; who report that there is a gathering of some Indians in or about Pennasook with design of mischief to English, amongst the said Indians one Hawkins (Kankamagn) is said to be a principle designer, and that they have a particular designe against yourselfe and Mr Peter Coffin which the Council thought it necessary presently to dispatch Advice thereof to give you notice that you take care of your own Safeguard, they intending to endeavor to betray you on a pretention of Trade, Please forthwith to Signify the import hereof to Mr. Coffin and others as you shall thinke necessary, and Advise of what Information you may receive at any time of the Indians motions.

"By Order in Council

"ISA: ABBINGTON, Secry.

"For Major Rich'd Waldron and Mr Peter Coffin or Either of them.

"At Cochecho

"These with all possible [speed,]"

The original of this letter is still preserved, and is the property of Rev. Edmund Q. S. Waldron, Catholic priest, of Maryland, a descendant of Major Walderne.

The messenger hastened towards Cochecho; he would have been in season, but he was unavoidably detained at Newbury ferry, and he reached the place only on the morning of the 28th, when it was too late.

On the evening of the 27th of June, 1689, two squaws, according to the previously-arranged plan, applied at each garrison-house for liberty to sleep in them; this was often done in time of peace, and they were readily admitted into Walderne's, Heard's, the elder Coffin's, and Otis's. At their own request they were shown how to open the doors and gates in case they wished to leave the house in the night. They told the major that a number of Indians were coming to trade with him the next day, and Mesandowit, who was at supper, said, "Brother Walderne, what would you do if the strange Indians should come?" "I could assemble a hundred men by lifting up my finger," carelessly answered the major. No watch was kept, and the family retired to rest.

In the hours of deepest quiet the gates were opened; the Indians who were waiting without immediately entered, placed a guard at the gate, and rushed into the major's apartment. Awakened by the noise, he sprang from his bed, seized a sword, and, though eighty years old, drove them through two or three rooms, but returning for other arms they came behind him, stunned him with a hatchet, and overpowered him; drawing him into the hall they then placed him in an elbow-chair on a long table with a derisive cry, "Who shall judge Indians now?" They then obliged the members of the family to get them some supper; when they had finished eating, they cut the major across the breast with knives, each one with a stroke saying, "I cross out my account." Cutting off his nose and ears they thrust them into his mouth, and when he was falling down, spent with the loss of blood, one of them held his own sword beneath him; he fell upon it and his sufferings were ended.

After the death of Maj. Walderne and the removal of the family by the Indians the house was burnt. Otis' garrison was captured in a similar manner to Walderne's; the owner, Richard Otis, was killed either in rising up in bed or on looking out the window; his son Stephen and daughter Hannah were killed, the latter, a child of two years, having her head dashed against the stairs; the wife and infant child of Richard Otis and two children of Stephen Otis (Stephen and Nathaniel), were carried captives to Canada. Three other daughters of Richard were carried away, but were recaptured in Conway. Heard's garrison was saved; the door had been opened and the Indians were entering, when Elder William Wentworth, who had been awakened by the barking of a dog, pushed them out, shut the door, and falling on his back, held it until the people came to his assistance; two bullets passed through the door but both missed him. The elder Coffin's house was similarly captured, but as the Indians had no particular enmity to him, they contented themselves with pillaging his house; finding a bag of money, they forced him to scatter it by handfuls while they amused themselves by scrambling for it. His son had refused to receive the squaws on the previous evening, but the Indians coming to his house, threatened to kill his father before his eyes unless he surrendered; to save his father's life he did so; these captives were placed in an empty dwelling, but in the confusion they escaped. Of Paine's garrison in its connection with this attack we know nothing; Gerrish's escaped.

Five or six houses were burnt, as were the mills upon the lower falls. Twenty-three persons were killed, and twenty-nine carried away captive. Their names are preserved only in part.

Of the sufferers, Mr. Lee was Abraham Lee (or Leigh), husband of Maj. Walderne's daughter Esther; Mr. Evans was certainly not the emigrant Robert, but probably John, who had deed of land at Cochecho, from Waldron, March 16, 1672-73; Richard Otis, owner of Otis' garrison; his daughter Hannah, a child of two years, was also killed; Jo. Dug was probably John, though no other reference to him is found; Jo. Duncan, perhaps John; William Arin, sometimes written Vrin, and perhaps same as Verin, a New Hampshire name; William Horn was the first of the family in Dover, and left descendants; old widow Hanson was Mary, widow of Thomas. This leaves eight unknown.

Of the captives, John Church (erroneously given as "Joseph Chase" in the N. H. Collections) escaped before the Indians reached Winnepe-saukee; Mrs. Leigh was ransomed in September following; Capt. Benjamin Church met her returning at Falmouth. (See Maine Hist. Coll., i. 293, and Dexter's "Church's Eastern Expeditions," 19; Tobias Hanson's wife; he was son of the "old widow" above; Otis' wife was Grizel (Warren), wife of the Richard above; she remained in Canada, married there, and died there at an advanced age. Sarah Gerrish was daughter of Capt. John Gerrish, and granddaughter of Maj. Walderne. (As to her mother there is some doubt. It is said that Capt. John Gerrish married Elizabeth Walderne, who was born Oct. 8, 1666; but in a conveyance of 1668 Walderne calls Gerrish his "son-in-law.") Sarah was exchanged late in 1690, on the occasion of Phips' expedition to Quebec. "Another girl of nine or ten years of age, who was somewhat well-looking, had been ransomed by the intendant's lady, who felt considerable pain at her surrender, yet nevertheless submitted for the public good." (Narrative, 1690, in N. Y. Coll. Doc., ix. 984; also Frontenac's report, same, p. 461.) "And in order to have our Priest, who would never have been restored had not Sieur de la Vallière induced this General's [Phips] principal Chaplain to come to negotiate with him, and declared to him that they would carry him to Quebec if they refused to exchange Sieur Trouvé [the priest] for a little girl whom the intendant's lady had bought of the Indians, and whom she offered to give up." This was Sarah Gerrish.

Besides those mentioned above there were captured Christiné Otis, youngest child of the first Richard, for whom see N. E. Hist. and Gen. Reg., v. 189, and its references; Rose Otis, doubtless the Rose daughter of the second Richard; John Otis, "a boy," still a prisoner in 1695, and not traced later; Stephen Otis (rebaptized in Canada as "Joseph Marie"), and Nathaniel Otis (rebaptized as "Paul"), sons of Stephen, both of whom remained in Canada, were living in 1710 as "Hotesse," and one was then married; John Evans, "a young man from Cochecho," mentioned in "Indian Captivities," 86. Eighteen are thus left unknown. Some of them are doubtless in the list of captives in Quebec in 1695, Mass. Archives, A. 38, page 1; but as the residences there given are often incorrect, it is impossible to distinguish.

An incident which relieves the sickening character of the details should be recorded. We give it in the peculiar language of Cotton Mather:

"Mrs. Elizabeth Heard, a Widow of a good Estate, a Mother of many Children, and a Daughter of Mr. Hull, a Reverend Minister formerly Living at Piscataqua, now lived at Quochecho: happening to be at Portsmouth on the day before Quochecho was cut off, she returned thither in the Night with one Daughter and Three Sons, all Masters of Families. When they came near Quochecho they were astonished with a Prodigious Noise of Indians, Howling, Shooting, Shouting and Roaring, according to their manners in making an Assault.

"Their Distress for their Families carried them still farther up the River, till they secretly and silently passed by some Numbers of the Raging Savages. They landed about an Hundred Rods from Major Waldern's Garrison; and running up the Hill, they saw many Lights in the Windows of the Garrison, which they concluded the English within had set up for the Direction of those who might seek a Refuge there. Coming to the Gate they desired Entrance, which not being readily granted, they called earnestly, and bounced and knocked and cried out of their unkindness within, that they would not open to them in this Extremity. No answer being yet made, they began to doubt whether all was well; and one of the young Men then climbing up the Wall, saw a horrible Tawny in the Entry, with a Gun in his hand. A grievous Consternation seized now upon them; and Mrs. Heard, sitting down without the Gate through Despair and Faintness, unable to stir any farther, charged her Children to shift for themselves, for she must unavoidably there end her days. They finding it impossible to carry her with them, with heavy Hearts forsook her, but then coming better to herself, she fled and hid among the Barberry-Bushes in the Garden. And then hastening from thence because the Daylight advanced, she sheltered herself (though seen by Two of the Indians) in a Thicket of other Bushes, about Thirty Rods from the House. Here she had not been long before an Indian came towards her, with a Pistol in his Hand. The Indian came up to her, and stared her in the Face, but said nothing to her, nor she to him. He went a little way back and came again, and stared upon her as before, but said nothing: whereupon she asked, what he would have? He still said nothing, but went away to the House Co-hooping, and returned to her no more. Being thus unaccountably preserved, she made several Essays to pass the River, but found herself unable to do it: and finding all Places on that side the River filled with Blood and Fire and Hideous Outcries, thereupon she returned to her old Bush, and there poured out her ardent Prayers to God for help in this Distress. She con-timed in the Bush until the Garrison was Burnt, and the Enemy was gone; and then she stole along by the River side until she came to a Boom, where she passed over. Many sad Effects of Cruelty she saw left by the Indians in her way; until arriving at Captain Gerrish's Garrison, she there found a Refuge from the Storm; and here she soon had the Satisfaction to understand that her own Garrison, though one of the first that was assaulted, had been bravely Defended and Maintained against the Adversary. This gentle woman's Garrison was the most extreme Frontier of the Province, and more Obnoxious than any other, and more uncapable of Relief; nevertheless, by her Presence and Courage, it held out all the War, ever for Ten Years together; and the Persons in it have enjoyed very Eminent Preservations. The garrison had been deserted, if she had accepted Offers that were made her by her Friends of Living in more safety at Portsmouth; which would have been a Damage to the Town and Land. But by her Encouragement this Post was thus kept; and she is yet Living [1698] in much Esteem among her Neighbors."

The fact most to our purpose in this connection the chronicler, perhaps from ignorance, omitted. It is this: When the four hundred Indians were captured at Cochecho, in 1676, one, a young man, escaped and took refuge with Mrs. Heard. She concealed him, and he afterwards escaped. This Indian, she supposed, was the one who gazed at her so earnestly in her dangerous hiding-place on the morning of the attack.

While this attack is usually attributed to revenge for the seizures of Indians at Cochecho by Waldron and Frost in 1676, in obedience to orders from the Massachusetts government, Belknap, however, refers to "Popish emissaries." In a paper of January, 1690 (N. Y. Col. Doc., ix. 440), M. de Denonville, Governor of Canada, says, "The good understanding I have maintained with these Indians through the care of the Jesuits, especially the two fathers Bigot, brothers, contributed to the success of all their attacks this summer on the English," etc.

On the morning after the massacre the people poured in from all parts of the town, but the enemy had vanished. Pursuit was made, which resulted in the recapture of three daughters of Richard Otis, who were overtaken near the present town of Conway; no other good was accomplished, for the suddenness of the attack and the celerity of the departure alike baffled all efforts. Further attacks were, however, expected, and information was immediately sent to Portsmouth to the son of Maj. Walderne, a resident of that town, who dispatched a messenger to Salisbury with the following letter:

"PORTSMOUTH, 28th June, 1689.

"about 8 o'clock, morning.

"Just now came ashore here from Cochecho, John Ham and his wife, who went hence last night homeward [with Mrs. Heard] (they living with in a mile of Major Walderne), and about break of day going up the river in a canoe they heard guns fired, but notwithstanding proceeded to land at Major Walderne's landing-place, by which time it began to be light, and they saw about twenty Indians near Mr. Coffin's garrison, shooting and shouting, as many more about Richard Otis's and Thomas Pain's, but saw their way to Major Walderne's, where they intended immediately to secure themselves; but coming to the gate and calling and knocking, could receive no answer, yet saw a light in one of the chambers and one of them say (looking through a crack of the gate) that he saw sundry Indians within the garrison, which supposed had murdered Major Walderne and his family; and thereupon they betook themselves to make an escape, which they did, and met one of Otis's sons, who also escaped from his father's garrison, informing that his father and the rest of the family were killed. Quickly after they set sundry houses on fire. This is all the account we have at present, which, being given in a surprise, may admit of some alterations; but doubtless the most of those at or about Cochecho are destroyed.

"The above account was related to me.

"PORTSMOUTH, 28th June, 1689.

It was received by Maj. Pike, who forwarded the papers immediately to the Governor at Boston, with the following addition:

"SALISBURY, June 28, 1689, about noon.

"Much Honoured,

"After due respect, these are only to give your honours the sad account of the last nights providence at Cochecho, as by the enclosed, the particulars whereof are awful. The only wise God, who is the Keeper that neither slumbereth nor sleepeeth, is pleased to permit what is done. Possibly it may be either better or worse than this account renders it. As soon as I get more intelligence, shall, God willing, speed it to your honours, praying your speedy order or advice in so solemn a case. I have despatched the intelligence to other towns, with advice to look to yourselves. Shall not be wanting to serve in what I may. Should have waited on your honours now, had I been well. "Received about 12 at night, upon Friday the 28th June."

The following answer was returned to Portsmouth:

"BOSTON, 29th June, 1689.

"Gentlemen.—The sad account given by yourselves of the awful hand of God, in permitting the heathen to make such desolations upon Cochecho, and destruction of the inhabitants thereof, being forwarded by the hand of Major Robert Pike, arrived the last night about twelve o'clock; notice thereof was immediately despatched to our own towns, that so they may provide for their security and defence; and the narrative you give of the matter was laid before the whole Convention this morning, who are concerned for you as friends and neighbors, and look at the whole to be involved in this unhappy conjuncture and trouble given by the heathen, and are very ready to yield you all assistance as they may be capable, and do think it necessary that if it be not done already you would fall into some form or constitution for the exercise of government, so far as may be necessary for your safety and convenience of your peace, and to intend such further acts as the present emergencies require—this Convention not thinking it meet, under their present circumstances, to exert any authority within your Province, Praying God to direct in all the arduous affairs the poor people of this country have to contend to engage in, and to rebuke all our enemies, desiring you would give us advice from time to time of the occurrences with you.

"Gentlemen, your humble servant,

"ISAAC ABBINGTON, Sec'ry.

"Per order of the Convention.

"Dated as above said.

"Voted by the Representatives in the affirmative.

"Attest,

EBENEZER PROUT, Clerk.

"Consented to by the Governor and Council, 29th June, 1689,

"ISAAC ABBINGTON, Sec'ry.

"For Messrs. Richard Martyn,

Wm. Vaughan, Richard Waldron, &c. at Portsmouth, these with all speed.

This paper is indorsed,— "Despatched upon Saturday, the 29th of June, '89, at 12 o'clock, at noon."

Accompanying the above is the draft of a letter which we suppose was written by the Governor:

"Gentlemen,—We have read yours, informing God's severe humbling hand, suffering the enemy with so much violence and rage, to destroy and lay waste before them on so sudden a surprisal. We must all say the Lord is righteous; we have sinned. It is not, as you well know, in our power to direct in your matters authoritatively, but as friends, and under our [your] prince, are ready to our utmost to yield our assistance in helping you with ammunition or anything in our power, men, or moneys. It remains with yourselves to meet and consider your own circumstances, and put yourselves in such a way (if not so at present) as may accommodate the present emergency in the best manner ye may, and then let us know what you desire, and we shall serve you to our power. Our present circumstances do not advantage us to impress men, or levy money, but must do as we can. God help us all to humble ourselves under God's mighty hands."

Aid was immediately dispatched to Cochecho, though no further attack was then made.

No name is more prominent in early New Hampshire history than that of Walderne. Identified as its various members have been with the prosperity of the State, our readers will pardon us if we devote more space than usual in our biographical notices to the head of this family.

Richard Waldron, or Walderne rather, as he spelled his name, was born, according to tradition, in Somersetshire, England, in 1609. He came to America (says the fragment of a letter from James Jeffrey to Counselor Richard Waldron, grandson of the subject of this article) with "Mr. Hilton or Mr. Wiggin [in 1635] to see the country: he stayed about two Years & returned to England and there Married a Gentlewoman of a very good family (whose parents were very unwilling She Should come away;) her names are not remembered, nor of wt place. Your Great Grandfather did not come with your grandfather."

Upon his first visit Richard Walderne seems to have purchased land of Capt. Wiggin upon Dover Neck, and to have made arrangements for settlement. On his final return he purchased a large tract of land at Cochecho lower falls, where in 1640, or a little earlier perhaps, it is said that he made his residence. Probably he also built a saw-mill in 1640, as in 1649, in a deed to Joseph Austin, he conveys part of the "old mill." This was the origin of the settlement long known as Cochecho, and now the central part of the flourishing town of Dover.

Soon after his settlement he purchased a large amount of standing timber from the town to engage in the preparation of lumber, pipe-staves, etc., which speedily became the main business of the town. He erected a saw-mill, apparently the second, in 1649 (James Wall, of Exeter, carpenter, being the builder), which was finished previous to August 2d. A constant succession of mills have since occupied the spot. Here, too, on the north side of Cochecho lower falls, he rescued land from the wilderness for a farm. Here he made his home and here found his grave.

He was the leading man in town affairs; was at least fourteen years representative of Dover in the General Court at Boston, and seven years Speaker of the House; was judge, major commanding the forces of New Hampshire, mandamus-councilor, Deputy Governor, and temporarily President of the province.

He was buried in the Waldron graveyard, east of the Methodist Church, near the spot where his great-grandson Thomas Westbrook Waldron's tombstone stands.

The condition of Cochecho a week after the attack will appear from the following letter from William Vaughan and Richard Waldron:

"From Capt. Gerrish's Garrison at Cochecho 5th July 1689.

"May It please your Honors,

Several years passed away before Cochecho recovered its former vigor. The inhabitants, indeed, principally returned to their houses or rebuilt them, but the loss of so many persons was a severe blow to its prosperity. Before 1700, however, it had assumed its former importance, and though occasionally harassed by the enemy it was never again the subject of so destructive an attack.

The first Indian war in New Hampshire did not end with the destruction of Cochecho in the summer of 1689; it continued five years longer. Yet though that first severe blow upon the frontier made the inhabitants tremulously sensitive to rumors and indications of trouble, from that time Cochecho was comparatively unharmed. Other parts of this and the neighboring towns were not so fortunate.

Thus after the massacre at Cochecho not all of the Indians immediately left for Canada, whither a part went with the captives. Shortly after, as the following letter shows, they were at Oyster River, then a part of Dover.

"Hampton, July 30, 1689

"Major Pike Sir This is to informe you that this last night There came news to me from Exeter that one of Philip Cromwells Sons came yesterday from oyster River where were 20 Indians Seen and several Houses Burning. About 20 English I-hud out to beat them off a many guns were herd go off but he coming away while it was a doing we have not as yett any account of what harme is ther done and we thank you for your care about our ——— Although no help could be procured there is but a few could be procured with as the notice was so suddaine but thus that are gon went yesterday when it was almost night they were Willing to stay no longer. When I have account fater from Oyster River I will send it to you not Els at present

"from your friend

"SAMUEL SHERBURNE."

The result of this attack we are unable to learn. Belknap does not allude to it at all, and the Massachusetts State Papers, in which the letter is filed, present no additional information.

Belknap tells us, however, of an affair of the succeeding August. Indians, watching in the woods about Oyster River, noticed how many men belonged to the garrison of James Huckins; they counted eighteen. Seeing them all go out to work one morning, they got between them and the garrison and killed all of them but one. In the house were two boys, some women, and children; it was attacked, but the boys defended it manfully until it was set on fire, when, on promises of safety to all, they surrendered. Three or four of the children, however, were killed, and the others of the party carried off. One of the boys escaped the next day and told the story. He, or some other of the children, became himself an Indian-fighter, and was father to a son who, a soldier, died in the army of the old French war.

Upon the other side of Cochecho, also, there was trouble. A united campaign for the first time was entered upon. Three parties of French and Indians were detached from Canada by Count de Frontenac: the one burned Schenectady, the second surprised Salmon Falls, the third destroyed Casco.

At Salmon Falls the attack was as unexpected as at Cochecho. Sienn Hertel, a French officer of energy, led through the forests and amidst snows a company of fifty-two men from Trois Rivières, there being among them Wahwa, better known as Hoophood, a noted warrior, commanding twenty-five Indians. They reached Salmon Falls March 18, 1690, and at daybreak attacked the garrisons from three directions. The surprised people made a vigorous resistance, but when thirty of their bravest were killed, including nearly every man, the fifty-four remaining, nearly all women and children, surrendered. The enemy burned twenty structures, including houses, barns, and mills (Charlevoix says twenty-seven), destroying many cattle in the barns, committed depredations as far as Quamphagan, and retreated. A hundred men were hastily collected from the neighboring towns and pursued them. Hertel, encumbered with captives, expected to be overtaken; he posted himself therefore beyond a narrow bridge on Wooster's River, in Berwick. The pursuers arrived and attacked him, but after two hours of warm fighting, extending into the darkness of the night, they found themselves unable to force his position and retired, taking with them one prisoner, a Frenchman. Hertel sent the captives, with part of his force, to Canada; himself continuing a campaign resulting in similar success at the burning of Casco.

From their date the following letters possess a peculiar interest. They correct one or two slight errors in published history:

" Upon Examination of the french taken at Salmon falls he said

" Their Company that Attaq'd Salmon falls consisted of sixty men 20 french and 40 Indians who came from Canada the beginning of februr from a Town called thirty Rivers lying above Casbeck, that they have not been near any English Plantation since they came out till now but waited about twenty or thirty miles all several days for a party of 20 or 30 Indians who promised to meet A Joya with them but came not, yt they have lived wholly upon hunting, yt they came by order of the french Govt at Canada & that both french and Indians are in pay at ten Lavers p month. The said Govt is Count Fontenack yt arrived from France last year in A man of warr with several merchant Ships wch went away again in Sher. only two ships remain in Canada of Twenty five Guns a piece. That two parties of french & Indians of three hundred men in A Company came out about the same time they came, but whether they were design'd he saith he knows not. That he knows nothing of the Mischiefe done near Albany, that they intended to carry their captives to Canada & there sell them, yt their design was not against this place when they first came forth but principally against Monsieur Tyng & the place where he lived but he saith the Indians who were their principle pilots did often Vary in their Opinions about wt place to fall upon. cant understand whether it were Mr Tyng of Merrimack River or Casco Bay. That they saw no Considerable Company of Indians in their March only a few in some places hunting, that they brought out with them two pounds of powder & sixty bullets a piece, that they are sundry English Captives at Canada but he saw only three two girls and a boy, that the french are able to raise four or five thousand men in Canada able to bear arms, & yt they have Thirty two Companies of fifty men in a company in constant pay. That the french Captains of this Company is Monsieur Arrelat: his son being his Lieut."

These communications were forwarded to Boston.

Attacks, but less appalling, followed the disastrous blows upon Salmon Falls and Casco. By the destruction of the latter the inhabitants of Maine were driven back to Wells. The Indians followed them. Some writer says that in the same month (May) a party under Hoophood attacked the inhabitants of Fox Point, in Newington, then of Dover, they burned several houses, killed about fourteen people, and carried away six captives; that pursuers recovered some of the captives, and wounded Hoophood. But the researches of the late Charles W. Tuttle convince us that this has no foundation whatever. But, to the great joy of the whites, Hoophood was soon mistaken by his allies for an Iroquois and killed.

On the 4th of July eight persons swimming at Lamprey River were killed and a boy captured. In the fight the enemy attacked Capt. Hilton's garrison at Exeter, but with no success, save to kill a few whites. The day following is more memorable.

The provincial authority at Portsmouth had determined to send an expedition into the forest against the Indians. Capt. Wiswall was designated for this service. It being advisable to join another captain with him, members volunteered, of whom Capt. Floyd was selected by lot. A hundred men rendezvoused at Dover, and started westward. On Sunday morning, 6th of July, the advanced scouts reported an Indian trail. They followed it and overtook the enemy on the borders of Wheelwright's Pond; an engagement followed, in which each man fought for himself, in the Indian custom. After hours of fighting, Wiswall, Flag, his lieutenant, Walker, his sergeant, and twelve others having fallen, and the bulk of the remainder being rather exhausted by the heat of the summer day, Floyd retreated, the Indians, however, doing the same. Floyd was blamed afterwards, but clearly without cause. This was in the then limits of Dover.

Few attacks were made in this vicinity for two years following; for the Indians in a conference at Sagadahock made a truce which continued until June, 1694, a month longer, strange to say, than the time agreed upon; then Wells was attacked, but unsuccessfully; two men were killed at Exeter, and in September twenty-one persons were killed or captured at Rye. But a new and more energetic plan of guarding the frontiers by the constant ranging of sufficiently strong scouting parties from one post to another being adopted, the only incidents which took place during the succeeding winter were that a party which fired upon a young man in the woods of Cochecho was followed and all excepting one man slain; that Tobias Hanson was killed at Dover, May 10, 1693; and that mischief was perpetrated upon "one poor family which they took at Oyster River."

Further quiet was obtained also by a treaty of peace concluded at Pennaquid, Aug. 11, 1693, signed by thirteen Indian chiefs, four other Indians, and three English interpreters. The Indians then acknowledged their subjection to the English crown, promised to abandon the French alliance, to return their captives, to forbear the gratification of private revenge, and, with sad mockery, to keep a perpetual peace. To Dover, with the rest of the province, this treaty gave a happy breathing-time; their continued alertness, the wasting of their property, the inability of cultivating their lands, and the destruction of their men had wellnigh exhausted and dispirited the people.

The peace was short; French cunning found a new element by which to excite Indian hate. Religious fanaticism was added by the labors of tireless French missionaries, and through this Sieur de Villieu, commander upon the Penobscot in 1694, broke the treaty. The first blow fell upon Oyster River, then part of Dover, now Durham. The history of this attack belongs more particularly under "Durham," and we add here only the names of sufferers, with a few notes of reference. The journal of Rev. John Pike, minister of Dover at that time, says,—

"July 18.—The Indians fell suddenly & unexpectedly upon Oyster River about break of Day. Took 3 Garrisons (being deserted or not defended), killed & Carried away 94 persons, & burnt 13 houses—this was the fr act of hostility Committed by y<sup>m</sup> after y<sup>e</sup> peace Concluded at Penmaquid."

Extended account is in Belknap, p. 138. The original manuscript statement to which he refers in note, p. 141, is preserved. See also Shea's Charlevoix, iv. 256. Shea refers also to the relation of French commander, 2 Canada Doc. vii. Papers in the Mass. Archives, vol. iii. pp. 480-3, are: Thomas Packer, at Portsmouth, July 18, to Governor Usher, at Newcastle, with brief statement; Governor Usher, same day, nine o'clock A.M., to Governor Phips, inclosing preceding, and asking help; reply of Governor Phips, July 19; Governor Usher to Governor Phips, July 21, indorsed with action in sending troops; Secretary Redford, at Portsmouth, officially, to Governor Phips, with particulars. Also, vol. viii. pp. 40-41, depositions of Ann Jenkins and Thomasine Drew, printed in N. E. Hist. and Gen. Reg., vol. xviii. See also Proceedings of Council, "N. H. Prov. Papers," ii. 124, et ultra. Pike says "3 garrisons" were taken; Belknap says five; Charlevoix says "here there were two forts" carried by attack. The discrepancy is but nominal. There were but two garrison-houses carried by assault, the other three taken being deserted; and Belknap reckons some houses with palisades as garrison-houses which Pike does not. Charlevoix makes the absurd statement that "two hundred and thirty English perished." The part of the town attacked did not have that amount of population, while seven of the twelve garrisons were successfully defended. Villieu claims to have killed 104 persons, and captured 27. As to the enemy's force, the letter of Redford estimates it at "not less than three hundred;" and Charlevoix says "two hundred and fifty Indians from," etc., joined by "the Abenakis of the elder Father Bigot's mission." Redford's letter says that "Donie, who signed the peace, was there,"—Robin Donie, signer of the peace at Pennaquid. From the Durham manuscript and other sources some names are attainable. Killed: John Dean; "old Mr. Hucksins;" a woman named Chesley, "and several others of the same name;" Robert Watson and family, "except his wife,"—yet I think that one son escaped; Ensign John Davis, his wife, and "several" children; Sarah (Davis) Smith (widow of James) and two sons; a Clark; a Gellison; Charles Adams and a son; Samuel Adams and wife; Edward Leathers' wife; a woman named Jackson; Zachariah Egerly (son of Thomas); a child of Thomas Egerly, Jr.; Francis Drew, his wife, and his son Benjamin; a Jenkins, his grandmother, and his child. Of the captives: Two daughters of Ensign John Davis, one of whom returned, the other remained in a nunnery; some of the family of Charles Adams, Jr., certainly his daughter Ursula, baptized in Canada, April 6, 1697; Mrs. Amblar; some children of Thomas Egerly, Jr.; Thomas Egerly, Sr., a daughter, and his son Joseph; Thomas Drew and wife, both of whom returned; Ann, wife of Jenkins above, and three children (see her deposition in Mass. Archives, vol. viii. p. 46; and probably Joseph Watson, who was baptized in Canada, April 28, 1697. In list of sixteen "Captives Rec<sup>d</sup> Aboard the Province Gallie," Jan. 17, 1698-99 (Mass. Archives, vol. lxx. p. 398), are Elizabeth Egerly, Susanna Egerly, and John Derry, all of Oyster River; and of those remaining in captivity, Juda Emerson, of Oyster River, and Peter Denbow. Woodman's garrison, successfully defended, is still standing, having been carefully preserved. The late John S. Woodman, professor in Dartmouth College, had seen the bullet-holes when the old tim-were uncovered during the repairs of the building.

“Portsmouth July 15th [1694].”

“Just now arrived a post from Oyster River. The Indians have destroyed the place killed & burnt all they could here — have Escaped and are too badly wounded do not know but they be all over on frontiers

“Since the Lt Governour of 15th inst; another is Come to our hand, the Indians were Nantons. Not less than three hundred. Danie who signed the Piece was there, a Woman who was Danie's Servant made her Escape, by reason of his being drunk. Salth Dome did tell her that they did Expect 600 Indians more, that the Mangwats were joynd with them, and judge Some Southern Indians were there. There is Two Fryars among the Indians who after Victory said Mass twice, the Indians did Spred 6 or 7 miles, and engaged all at once. Oyster River in a narrow Rained, only abt 20 houses left, the rest layd waste, unless we have a Supply of men from yourself Oyster River must be deserted. If Oyster River be deserted, the Enimie will have an inlett in to the whole Countrey. For the Majest-Servise & Security of the Countrey desire you would forthwith Supply us with one hundred men with ammunition & Provision to be Posted for Preservation of these Out places. We are dispatching Some Souldiers into our Outward Garrison according to the ability of this Province upon the Alarms with all expedition. We dispatched from the severall Towns one third of the Militia in this Province for Reliefe of Oyster River, but before they came there the Enimie was drawn off and could not be met with; its Judged Eighty persons Killd & taken abundance of Cattle Killd. last Night three Indians Seen Several Guns fired. Judg the Enimie is still hovering upon us, but we want assistance to pursue them, the Enimie being so numerous; Desire that Orders may be given to Justices and all Constables for the dispatch of Expresses: Not doubting of your Readiness to assist us, we being ready to afford our assistance according to our ability; to your parts case the Enimie should invade yours. Wee crave your answer by this ————ess.”

“By order of the Lt Governour & Council,

“WM REFORMED: Deputy Sec'ly.”

The apprehensions of further violence were unbaptly realized. Not all of the body who attacked Oyster River returned immediately. While one portion under Toxus, a Norridgewock, went westward, a smaller party crossed the Pascataqua and killed Ursula Cutt (widow of the President Cutt) and three others, haymakers. That day Col. Richard Waldron had promised to dine with her, but the arrival of friends prevented it. While at dinner in his own house he heard of her death.

In July, 1695, two men were killed at Exeter. On the 7th of May, 1696, John Church was killed and scalped at Cochecho. Various persons were killed at Portsmouth on the 26th of June, and the recapture of Breakfast Hill, in Rye, took place the next day, of which an account is here unnecessary. On the 26th of July the people of Dover were waylaid and fired upon as they were returning home from meeting. Nicholas Otis, Mary Downs, and Mary Jones were killed; Richard Otis, Anthony Lowden, and Experience Heard were wounded; John Tucker, Nicholas Otis, Jr., and Judith Ricker were captured. As these persons all appear to have lived between Waldron's Garrison and Garrison Hill, it is probable that the attack was between the upper falls and the brow of the hill before reaching Otis's Garrison.

Of affairs at Exeter, of the killing of Maj. Frost at Kittery, of the threatened invasion by sea, our purpose forbids minute accounts. Dover soil was no more molested during that war, and the war itself soon ended.

The peace of Ryswick, concluded in Europe, Sept. 20, 1697, forced the French Governor Frontenac to withdraw his protection and assistance from the Indians, as France and England were no longer at war. He advised the Indians, therefore, to bury the hatchet and peace was concluded at Casco, Jan. 9, 1699. Among other promises, it was agreed that captives should be returned. Some, indeed, had, in 1695, been ransomed. Among these were John Keyser and John Key, Jr., of Cochecho; Elizabeth Smart and Cisca Brackett, of Oyster River. Others in the hands of the French at that time, memorials of the fate of Cochecho in 1689, and Oyster River in 1694, were Abigail Willey, Judy Willey, Elizabeth Willey, John Skyley, Sarah White, and Samuel Rand (a boy), of Oyster River; Grizel Otis, Christina Otis, John Otis (a boy), Rose Otis (a girl), Stephen Otis (inhabitants of the ill-fated Otis Garrison), John Anthony (a boy), and Obadiah Phebe, of Cochecho; and Joseph Perkins (a boy), Abigail Curlin, Lydia Langley (a girl), Mary Swarten, Abigail Brackett, Elizabeth Squir, John Persons (a boy), Roland Young (a boy), Ruth Persons, Mary Sayward, Esther Sayward, and H. Short (a boy), of Dover, but of unknown locality. How many of these ever returned it is impossible to tell. Christina Otis returned; Rose, her sister, did also, and married John Pinkham; John Otis probably remained in Canada; Stephen Otis certainly did; so did their mother-in-law, Grizel, who married there. Others doubtless did also, and so were finally lost to their friends.

CHAPTER C X V.

Tax-payers in 1733.—The town had early made grants or sales of lands to settlers, according to the powers of towns which owned the unoccupied lands within its limits. In 1733 the town made a final disposal of such as it did not wish to retain for public uses, retaining such as the “Landing” below the falls of the Cochecho. The following list, occasioned by this final distribution, shows the names of tax-payers in that year, and in some measure their relative property interest:

Whereas Mr John Cerney, Sam'l Cearl, James Nute, John Tasker, John Hayes, John Horn, Cap' Tho' Wallingford, Jeremiah Rawlings, and John Winget were chosen a Committee at a Publick Town Meeting holden at the Meeting-House at Cochecho in Dover the 27 of Feb<sup>r</sup> 1732-3

To Consider of some proper Methods to be taken To Dispose of the Common Lands within the Town of Dover to the Inhabitants of said Town, and to propose the Method or Methods which they should agree upon to the Town in Publick Town Meeting for the Towns acceptance, if it should see fit, which service the above sd Committee did accordingly perform, and likewise made Report thereof to the Town in a Publick Town Meeting holden at the Meeting House at Cochecho in Dover on the 4th Day of June 1733, at which Meeting the Town did Vote that the Portioning of the Common Lands in said Town, amongst the Inhabitants thereof, as it was performed and offer'd to the Town by said Committee, should be good and Valid.

French and Indian War.—The last year in which Dover blood was shed upon Dover soil was in 1725. Benjamin Evans and William Evans were the last victims. The Indians had been gradually driven back. Not long after the year 1700 they abandoned Peppawket and returned to Canada. To carry the war into Canada was the defense of lower New Hampshire. The French provinces partially felt what they had inflicted upon others. We can stop only to say that men of our ancient Dover were in the assault on Port Royal, in 1707, where Maj. Shadrach Walton, an ancestor of the writer of this sketch, and a son of an early Dover settler, and Capt. Chesley, of the Durham section, did the only creditable thing there; they formed their companies on the open beach, charged on the enemy, who were behind a sea-wall, and carried the position by assault. Dover men were in the attack on Norridgewock in 1722. They were scouts in all the wars following. In 1745, at the capture of Louisburg, Dover furnished a company, in which, as lieutenant, was Thomas Westbrook Waldron, great-grandson of the old major slain in the massacre of 1689, and the one who built the Waldron house, still standing on Second Street, and a company led by Capt. Samuel Hale. Old Dover furnished two companies for Crown Point, in 1755, and another the same year for Albany, under Paul Gerrish. In the expedition against Crown Point, in 1756, Samuel Gerrish led one company, and brave John Titcomb another,—that John Titcomb who lived in the original building which grew into the Dover Hotel, and of whose descendants is the wife of Prof. John R. Varney. In 1757 the western part of Dover sent a company, and John Titcomb commanded a second. It was part of this battalion which, after the surrender of Fort William Henry, was abandoned by Montcalm to the Indians, who killed eighty out of the one hundred and twenty New Hampshire men. Immediately old Dover furnished more men, and stout Maj. Thomas Tash led a battalion, the brave soldier who became a colonel in the war of the Revolution, whose great-grandson, George W. Tash, is now a citizen of Dover. John Titcomb was lieutenant-colonel of still another regiment raised in New Hampshire, on whose rolls were many Dover men. Col. Atkinson's regiment, for Canada in 1759, which served at the reduction of Fort Niagara, had Dover recruits. In Col. Goffe's regiment for the invasion of Canada, in 1760, was one company whose roll is full of Dover names. Dover men were at the capture of Ticonderoga, and in the reduction of Canada.

The muster-roll of Capt. Samuel Hale's company was preserved by his grandson, William Hale, of Dover, whose father, William Hale, was member of Congress, and the roll transferred to Nathaniel Low, a captain in the recent war, great-grandson of Capt. Samuel Hale.

Belknap, speaking of the New Hampshire Volunteers, says, "By the 17th of February two hundred and fifty men were enlisted for the service." New Hampshire furnished in all three hundred and fifty men, under command of Col. Samuel Moore; not including one hundred and fifty men raised in our province, but in the pay of Massachusetts. New Hampshire furnished one-eighth of the entire force raised in New England, a less proportion than at Bunker Hill, where more than one-half were from our State.

The paper is a regular muster-roll, made out for payment, with printed title, headings, and rules: the print occupying twelve inches in breadth and fifteen in height.

The printed title reads thus, a blank for name of captain being filled with the pen:

"A Muster-Roll of the Company in His Majesty's Service under the Command of Samuel Hale Captain. 1757."

Then come, on ruled columns, the following headings, and in the following order, the numbers being prefixed by us:

1. Men's Names.
2. Quality.
3. Of what Town.
4. Names of Fathers and Masters, of Sons under Age, and Servants.
5. Time of Entrance in the Service. Months, Days.
6. Till what Time in the Service. Months, Days.
7. Whole Time of Service. Weeks, Days.
8. Province Arms. Weeks.
9. The whole of Wages due to each Man.
10. What each Man received of the Commissary, etc.
11. Balance due to each Man.

In the first column there are fifty-three names, as below. The residences, when Dover, we omit.

The "Time of entrance in the Service" is given only in the case of the captain, but apparently is intended to include the whole company, viz., February 13th.

"Till what Time in the Service" is given in but twenty-two cases. These we note below.

"The whole of wages due to each Man" and "Balance due to each Man" are blank.

A solitary indorsement on the outside says, "N.B. The prices of things in this Muster Roll are Set down in old Tenor. S. H."

Other items we note in each case:

Samuel Hale, Captain, Dover. Entrance Feb. 13. In the service till Octr 1,—32 weeks, 6 days. Received of the Commissary, 19 shillings, 6 pence.

CHAPTER CXVII.

DOVER.—(Continued.)

The Revolutionary War.—The sympathies of Dover in the Revolutionary struggle were almost without exception upon the patriotic side. It had few office holders to sympathize with their employers. The teachings of Rev. Jeremy Belknap from the pulpit were bold and inspiring.

The first utterance which is found from Dr. Belknap bearing upon the subject which was beginning to enlist the thoughts of our fathers occurs in a sermon which he preached Nov. 10, 1772, before His Majesty's Governor, John Wentworth, Esq., at a review of the Second Regiment of Foot in Dover. New Hampshire had been inured to military service through its long period of war with the Indians. An old law required every male inhabitant from sixteen to sixty years of age to own a musket, bayonet, knapsack, cartridge-box, one pound of powder, twenty bullets, and twelve flints. This militia was organized into companies and regiments, and subject to frequent drills. The muster-day and the review was a great occasion. Dover was a centre of this military stir.
At this gathering here in November, 1772, the royal Governor, John Wentworth, came up from Portsmouth. Capt. Walderne, a member of this church, and a staunch friend of his pastor, had invited Dr.
Belknap to preach to the troops. The subject chosen by the preacher was "Military Duty." In the course of the sermon he spoke as follows on the necessity of self-defense:

"Has the all-wise and merciful Parent of the universe furnished the brute and reptile creation with the necessary instruments of defense, and does the instinct which he has implanted in them prompt them to make use of these weapons for their own subsistence and security? and has He not implanted in mankind a natural courage or martial spirit and given them skill and power to provide themselves with all the necessary instruments of defense, and can it be supposed that we must make no use of these gifts of nature, even when Providence points out the necessity? Do we guard our fields from devouring beasts, our houses and bodies from the rigors of the weather, and shall we not have the privilege of defending our lives, our liberties, our property, our families, our civil government from hostile invaders? Must we tamely yield to every lawless usurper and suffer tyrants to sport with the lives and estates of mankind? Must all these laws, which the wisdom and experience of ages have founded, must the sacred bonds of society, the peace, the welfare, the happiness of mankind be sacrificed to the impetuous rage of a foreign conqueror? Forbid it, reason and conscience; forbid it, ye heroic worthies of old, who through faith subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises, stopped the mouths of liars, quenched the violence of fire, escaped the edge of the sword, out of weakness were made strong, waxed valiant in fight, turned to flight the armies of the aliens."

The officers of the Second Regiment of Foot were so pleased with this address that they asked a copy for the press.

The General Assembly of New Hampshire was in session in May this year, 1774. Conformably to the proceedings of the Assemblies of other colonies, the representatives in this province appointed a Committee of Correspondence. Governor Wentworth interfered. He adjourned the Assembly. The members met again. The Governor with a sheriff came among them. He declared their meeting illegal. The sheriff made proclamation for all persons to disperse and keep the king's peace. The members met again, and determined to send letters to all the towns and parishes in the province, requesting them to send deputies to a convention at Exeter, who should choose delegates to a General Congress to meet at Philadelphia. This was the first movement for rallying the whole of the people of New Hampshire in the great contest. Attached to this most important letter to the several towns was this brief proclamation:
"Considering the Distressing situation of our public affairs, Thursday, the 14th inst., is recommended to be kept as a day of Fasting, Humiliation, and Prayer through this Province."

The day was observed here in Dover with special religious solemnity. On that occasion, July 14, 1774, Dr. Belknap preached a sermon which bears this title,
"On Account of the Difficulties of the King." The text was from 1 Sam. viii. 18: "And ye shall cry out in that day because of your king which ye shall have chosen you; and the Lord will not hear you in that day." A most pertinent text. In this sermon he says:

"It is, my brethren, a very dark day to these American colonies. Burdens and taxes are laid upon us by the Parliament of Great Britain, and the most forcible attempts are made to bring us to a submission, and what further is intended we know not, but we have reason to fear much, considering how highly they are incensed against us, and what power they have to carry their determination into execution. . . .
When a ruler departs from these principles, and sets up any other rule of government than the laws and Constitution which he is sworn to maintain, then the government degenerates into tyranny."

Perhaps the most remarkable passage in this noble sermon is the following:

"Would it not be astonishing to hear that a people who are contending so earnestly for liberty are not willing to allow liberty to others? Is it not astonishing to think that there are at this day, in the several colonies upon this continent, some thousands of men, women, and children detained in bondage and slavery for no other crime than that their skin is of a darker color than our own? Such is the inconsistency of our conduct! As we have made them slaves without their consent and without any crime, so it is just in God to permit other men to make slaves of us."

The tidings of the battle of Lexington reached Belknap at Dover Point, as he was on his way home from Portsmouth. He sent from the Point the following note to his wife:

"Before you receive this you will hear the awful news by the express I met just now at the ferry of the devastation the troops have made at Concord and the commencement of a civil war, which makes it absolutely necessary that I should proceed immediately to Boston, if it is not in ashes before I get there. I shall try and get a chaise at Greenland. As necessity has no law, the people must excuse my absence next Sabbath if I should not return before it."

He arrived at Cambridge in due time, and found himself "among ten thousand armed men who had gathered from every quarter" to take part in the next battle. From there he writes to his wife in Dover, "Don't let my gun and munition get out of the house if you can help it." The brave parson knew his gun well. Among his papers is a very precise description of it. He doubtless thought it most probable that he should be called to fight, in which case no "carnal weapon" could have served him better.

While at Cambridge, he preached in the morning in the street and in the afternoon in the meeting-house to the provincial army there assembled. He soon returned home with his parents.

Dover for the next few months was astir with military preparations. There was a company at once enlisted here by Capt. Benjamin Titcomb. On the 14th of June, three days before fire opened on Bunker Hill, Dr. Belknap preached to these soldiers on the "Nature of true courage." He said, "It is a very fashionable doctrine, especially among the British troops, that the soldier has nothing to do with the conscience of war, or to inquire whether it be just or not. He has only to obey orders. If soldiers had no consciences, if they were horses instead of men, this doctrine might be propagated with the utmost safety. But, my brethren, you are reasonable creatures. You are accountable to a higher tribunal than any earthly power, and you have a right to examine, and it is your duty to examine, whether the cause in which you are engaged is just, and if you find that it is so, you can fight with a good conscience, and with a hope in the Divine Providence for liberty and success. Let, then, every man believe himself in his proper station according to the duty required of him, and serve his country to the utmost of his power."

Four days after, news having been received that a battle had commenced at Charlestown, this company, under Capt. Titcomb, marched to the scene of battle.

It is matter of known tradition that Dr. Belknap, when news arrived of the Declaration of Independence, went to the one town school at Pine Hill, then kept by Master Wiggleworth, announced that America was now a nation, and himself and the master at the head, stopping to take up a drummer by the way, the whole school marched through town as far as the Col. John Waldene mansion, and returned. At the school-house Dr. Belknap offered prayer, and a holiday was then given.

The people of Dover took an early part as a municipality in remonstrating against those aggressions of the British government which led to the Revolution, and when remonstrances failed, and the cause of liberty was submitted to the stern arbitrament of arms, none exerted themselves more cheerfully or contributed more in proportion to their means to render that cause successful. As a record of interest, we publish from the town records all the proceedings, votes, etc., which we find in reference to the Revolutionary war. The first record which is made is the following:

"At a legal meeting of the qualified voters of the town of Dover, this tenth day of January, 1774, convened at the Friends' Meeting-House in said town on purpose to consider of the innovations attempted to be made on American Privileges—

"Col. OTIS BAKER was chosen Moderator—

"Although we deprecate every thing which in its infant motions tends to alienate the affection which ought to subsist among the subjects of the same King, yet, we cannot longer behold the Arts used to curtail the Privileges purchased with the blood and treasure of British America, and of New England in particular, for their Posterity, without bearing our Testimony against them.

"As these Colonies have recognized the Protestant Kings of Great Britain as their Lawful Sovereign, and WE in this Province the Man whom the King has pleased to send us as his Representative—We acknowledge this Representative from our first formation into a Government has had a negative voice on all Bills proposed by Laws in the manner his Majesty has at home.

"And as it doth not appear that any Parliaments have been parties to any Contracts made with the European Settlers in this once howling Wilderness, now become a pleasant field—We look on our Rights too dearly bought, to admit them now as Tax masters—Since (by laws as firm as the honor of crowned heads can make them, and which we have no Apprehension so good and gracious a King as we obey, will suffer to be abridged) we have Parliaments of our own—who always with the greatest Cheerfulness furnished his Majesty such Aids as he has been pleased to require from time to time according to the Abilities of the People, and even beyond them, of which, none but themselves could be adequate Judges.

“Why the King’s Subjects in Great Britain should frame Laws for his Subjects in America, rather than the reverse, we cannot well conceive, as we do not admit it to be drawn from any PACT made by our ancestors, or from the Nature of the British Constitution, which makes Representation essential to Taxation—and this supposed Power of Parliament for taxing America is quite novel, some few Instances for the better Regulation of Trade excepted, which no more prove their supposed Right, than the Tortious Entry of a Neighbor into the Infant’s field does that of the Intruder—but if Superior Strength be the best plea, how would they relish the Alternative? which if political Arithmetic deceives not advances with Hasty Strides; tho’ nothing but downright oppression will ever effect it.

“Therefore, Resolved, 1ly, That any attempt to take the Property of any of the King’s Subjects for any purpose whatever where they are not represented, is an Infraction of the English Constitution; and manifestly tends as well to destroy it, as the subject’s private property, of which recent proofs are plenty.

“Resolved 2ly, That We, and our American Brethren, are the liege People of King George the Third, and therefore have as full, and ample a Claim, to all the Privileges and Immunities of Englishmen, as any of his Subjects three thousand miles distant—the Truth of which, our Demeanor clearly evinces.

“Resolved 3ly, That the Parliament in Britain by suffering the East India Company to send us their Teas subject to a Duty on landing, have in a measure testified a Disregard to the Interests of Americans, whose liberal Services ill deserves such ungenerous Treatment.

“Resolved 4ly, That we are of opinion that any seeming Supineness of this Province in these very—very interesting matters, hath proceeded from a Consideration of their Smallness among their Brethren, rather than from any insensibility of impending Evils.

“Resolved 5ly, That this Town approves the general Exertions, and noble struggles, made by the opulent Colonies through the Continent, for preventing so fatal a Catastrophe as is implied in Taxation without Representation, viz SLAVERY—than which, to a generous Mind, Death is more Eligible.

“Resolved 6ly, That We are, and always will be ready in every constitutional Way, to give all the Weight in our Power to avert so dire a Calamity.

“Resolved 7ly, That a Dread of being enslaved Ourselves, and of transmitting the Chains to our Posterity (by which we should justly merit their curse) is the principal Inducement to these Measures.

“And Whereas, our house of Commons have a Committee for corresponding with those of the several Colonies on these matters, and the Committees of the several Towns in this Government to correspond with each other at the necessary Times, may be subservient to the common Cause—Therefore resolved that a Committee to consist of five persons be chosen for that purpose.

“Voted that Col. Otis Baker, Capt. Caleb Hodgdon, Capt. Stephen Evans, Capt. Joshua Wingate, and John Wentworth, jr, or either three of them, be the Committee of Correspondence for this Town.

“Voted that the proceedings of this meeting be entered in the Records of this Town, and that an attested Copy thereof be sent to the Committee of Correspondence at Portsmouth, to assure them, and all concerned, that our hearts are knit with those, who wish the weal (as it is constitutionally fixed) of our most gracious Sovereign, and all his numerous subjects.”

July 18, 1774.—A committee of five was chosen to represent the town at a meeting to be held at Exeter for “appointing Delegates to join in a General Congress of the Provinces for considering of and advising to the most conciliating methods of establishing their rights and harmony among all the subjects of our gracious Sovereign, which meeting is proposed to be held on the 1st Sept. at Philadelphia.” And 26 10s. were voted as the proportion of Dover towards paying the expenses of the delegates, which the selectmen were authorized to advance.

Nov. 7, 1774.—A town-meeting was called to see if the inhabitants would raise anything, either “in Money, Fat Cattle or Sheep,” for the relief of the Poor in Boston, then suffering from the operations of the Port Bill. And it was voted that the town would “give something.”

Dec. 26, 1774.—At a town-meeting the following preamble and resolutions were adopted:

The Designs of the Continental Congress holden at Philadelphia being so humane and benevolent, the result of their proceedings so salutary and effective as justly to attract the notice of the millions of freemen in America, this town on mature consultation are fully convinced that nothing (under Heaven) will so evidently tend to preserve the rights of Americans or frustrate the attempts already made for their destruction as carrying the same into full execution. For which purpose, Voted, That Messrs. Otis Baker, Shadrach Hodgdon, Stephen Evans, Joshua Wingate, John Waldron 3d, Caleb Hodgdon, John Wentworth, Jr., John Kielle, and John Gage be a committee.

Voted, they have the following instructions, viz.:

1st. We expect that to the utmost of your power you carefully intend the preservation of peace and good order in the town so far as the same may be endangered by a discussion of sentiment relative to political matters.

2d. We enjoin you that by every lawful means you see the recommendations and proceedings of the Continental Congress strictly complied with by the inhabitants of this town so far as we are therein concerned.

3dly. As examples you are to encourage every kind of Temperance, Frugality, Industry, and Economy and to discountenance every species of Vice, Immorality, and Profaneness. Neither to use any sort of Gaming or unlawful diversions yourselves nor suffer it to be done within your knowledge without intimating your own dislike and the displeasure of the town thereat.

4ly. Whereas, Hawkers, Pedlars, and Petty Chapmen are continually strolling through the country with Goods, Wares, and Merchandise (much of which was undoubtedly forwarded by the enemies of America) in order to vend the same to the great hurt and decay of trade and in defiance of a good and wholesome law of this Government—You are therefore not knowingly to harbor, conceal or entertain any one of them, nor purchase any of their wares, nor permit any within your knowledge to do it, and in case any Taverner, Innholder, or Retailer within this town, after being duly informed thereof, shall be knowingly guilty of either the acts in this instruction mentioned—You are to take every legal measure to prevent their ever hereafter being licensed by the Court of Sessions either as Taverners or Retailers.

5ly. Notwithstanding any persons may be so daring and hardy as to counteract the sense of the town expressed in these instructions, you are by no means to suffer any insult or abuse to be offered to either their persons or estates, but use your utmost endeavor to prevent the same.

6ly. Of all breaches of these Instructions you are as soon as may be to inform your neighbors and the Selectmen of the town that whenever it may be necessary the town may be convened in order to consult and advise thereon.

July 13, 1776.—Voted that forty-two shillings be given by the town to each of the soldiers enlisted and that shall enlist since the 11th inst., and proceed in the present expedition to Canada, not exceeding fifteen or sixteen men, and that the Selectmen hire the money (and pay the same) in the best manner they can immediately on the town's account.

May 5, 1777.—Voted that Col. Otis Baker, Capt. Thomas Young, and Capt. John Hayes be empowered to enlist what men is wanting to make this town's quota of men for completing the Battalions to be raised in this State, on the best terms they can.

Voted, that the Selectmen furnish the Committee with money to hire said men and raise the same in the next tax bill.

May 15, 1777.—Voted that the Alarm and Train Band Lists have three shillings a day and one shilling and sixpence a half day allowed them by the town for each day they train in a year more than the law requires.

Sept. 10, 1777.—It was "voted that thirty dollars be given to each soldier who enlists for the Continental Service until the last of November next, and that the Selectmen pay each soldier the said sum when mustered."

March 30, 1778.—It was "voted that a committee of two persons be chosen to inquire into the state of our quota of Continental troops, and if we are found lacking to take the most effectual measures for filling up the same."

June 15, 1778.—It was "voted that Mr. John Bm. Hanson, Col. Joshua Wingate and Maj. Caleb Hodgdon be a committee to hire six men as soldiers to go to Rhode Island to reinforce General Sullivan's Division."

May 10, 1779.—It was "voted that the Selectmen advance the Continental and State bounty agreeable to a request of the Committee of Safety if they have it in stock, and if not the Selectmen are empowered to hire money for said purpose."

July 5, 1779.—It was "voted that the Selectmen advance the Continental bounty being £60 and State bounty of £30 and travel for five men, and if they have it not in hand that they hire the same and have power to raise it in the next year's tax."

"Voted that a committee be chosen to hire eight men for the Continental Army one year and five men for the service at Rhode Island six months."

Aug. 30, 1779.—It was "voted that a hundred dollars a month be given nine men to serve as soldiers at Portsmouth, &c., including what the State is to pay them."

June 26, 1780.—It was "voted that the Selectmen be a committee for the purpose of getting eight men for the Continental Service on the best terms they can."

July 4, 1780.—It was "voted that the Selectmen with the two Captains of the Companies in Dover be a committee to get our quota of militia men for the Continental service."

Jan. 22, 1781.—It was "voted that Mr. Andrew Torr, Capt. John Gage, and Maj. Benja Titcomb be a committee to get the proportion of men wanting from this town to fill up and complete the Continental Army in the cheapest and most expeditious manner possible."

March 5, 1781.—It was "voted that each Recruit from this Town as their quota of men for completing the Continental Army have and receive as wages fourteen bushels of Indian Corn per month during their stay in service, and that the Selectmen give their security for the payment of the same accordingly."

July 16, 1781.—On the petition of Capt. Thomas Young and Capt. James Calef, stating that they had been "ordered by Col. Stephen Evans without loss of time to enlist or draft fourteen able bodied effective men to serve three months if not sooner discharged, wherever the commander in chief shall order as soldiers," it was "voted that Capt. Young and Capt. Calef be a committee to raise the 14 men required, and that they give thirty shillings silver money to each man that enlists, which they shall have whether called on to go into service or not, and when they march each man shall receive thirty shillings more like money."

Sept. 19, 1781.—At a town-meeting held for raising soldiers, it was "voted that nine men now to be raised for three months be given ten silver dollars each as bounty and paid fourteen bushels of merchantable Indian corn per month by the town in January, 1782."

After this date we find no record of any further proceedings in relation to the war.

The capture of Fort William and Mary, Dec. 14, 1774, largely by men from Durham, intensified the struggle. Of the men concerned in it prominently were Sullivan, Adams, Scammel, and others.

The then Governor, John Wentworth, the best of all the royal Governors of that day, descended from that William Wentworth who was elder of the Dover First Church, and of the same blood with that Earl of Stratford who was beheaded in the time of the first Charles, and with the British premier, the Marquis of Rockingham, soon sailed away never again to set foot upon his native soil. John Langdon, after gallant service in the war and priceless service in its civil support, became Governor and the first president of the Senate of the United States. John Sullivan, then a lawyer in Durham, was son of that John Sullivan who was once schoolmaster of the town of Dover, and who was the father of Governors, and was born on Dover side of the Salmon Falls. To him the refugee Livius wrote from Montreal in 1777 urging his return to the royal cause, promising him particular reward, and saying, "You were the first man in active rebellion," and Livius had fled from Portsmouth. Sullivan became major-general and Governor of his State. Winborn Adams, also of Dover blood, was lieutenant-colonel when he met his death at Stillwater. Alexander Scammel, of that Durham party, was adjutant-general of the army when he fell at Yorktown. Demeritt, Griffin, Bennett, Chesley, Noble, and Durgin of that expedition all did service in the army of the Revolution.

When news came of the slaughter at Concord, New Hampshire was aroused. Men collected from every quarter. "It is surprising," wrote Col. John Wentworth, April 25th, "to see the number who collected. Some came to Dover, twenty miles or more." Shadrach Hodgdon and Stephen Evans represented Dover in the convention of the "Friends of Liberty," which met at Exeter on the 13th of May. That convention voted to raise two thousand men, and to accept those who had already hurried to the field. Three regiments were raised. Stark's and Reid's had the glory of fighting at Bunker Hill. The other, the Second, Col. Poor's, was largely on duty on the coast, from Odiorne's Point to the Merrimac. Most of the Dover soldiers were in that Second, but there were scattering recruits in the Third certainly.

In the Second was the company of Capt. Winborn Adams,—John Griffin, first lieutenant, Zebulon Drew, second lieutenant,—from Durham, which was at Bunker Hill. In the same regiment was Capt. Jonathan Wentworth, "old Colonel Jonathan," of Rollinsford, James Carr, first lieutenant, Jethro Heard, second lieutenant. He made a forced march of sixty-two miles previous to the battle of Bunker Hill, and arrived in Chelsea on that morning, but could not cross the river on account of the enemy, and went round by way of Medford. Jonathan Wentworth was adjutant of Col. Evans' regiment at the capture of Burgoyne, and in 1778 was on the staff of Sullivan with the rank of lieutenant-colonel. His posterity are here. He had two brothers in service, one of whom died in the army. In the Third Regiment was Ezra Green, its surgeon, well known to many living, who had passed his hundred years when he died in Dover. He served on land until 1778, and then sailed with John Paul Jones, and was surgeon of the "Ranger" in its great battle. Immediately after the battle of Bunker Hill reinforcements went forward. I find in Belknap's diary, on the second day after the battle, "Benj. Titcomb's co. marched from here." This was that Benjamin Titcomb, brother of old Col. John, who afterwards became lieutenant-colonel, and one of the most gallant men in the army. Though severely wounded in three different battles he served through the war, and ended his days here at his house by Dunn's bridge. His descendants are still in Dover. With him in 1775 was his first lieutenant, Frederick Mordant Bell, who, a captain in 1777, was mortally wounded at Stillwater. His granddaughter is still here. Ephraim Evans was second lieutenant in the same company. The present Dover also raised at once another company,—John Waldron, captain, Timothy Roberts, first lieutenant, Paul Welland, second lieutenant, John Heard, ensign,—and sent it to Cambridge, mustered in July 3, 1775.

In 1775 the six towns which composed ancient Dover had, between the ages of sixteen and fifty, one thousand and seventy men, including the sick, the feeble, the exempt, and the sailors off at sea. Of this number, in the early autumn of that year, one hundred and fifty, or nearly one-seventh of the whole, had shouldered the musket and were actually in the field. It was evidence of the same alacrity which caused New Hampshire to furnish more than half the men who fought the battle of Bunker Hill, at the very gates of Boston.

Washington made an urgent appeal to New Hampshire for men, and Sullivan added his influence. Thirty-one companies volunteered and marched to Cambridge. In this force were the companies of Elijah Dinsmore, of Lee; Alpheus Chesley, of Durham; Moses Yeaton, of Somersworth; and John Waldron, of Dover. In December, 1775, New Hampshire had in the field over five thousand men! John Waldron was in service when the exigency arose. He came home to Dover to raise recruits. Of his own company, Ebenezer Ricker was first lieutenant, and John Goodwin was second lieutenant. Tradition has told us that in four days he and his selected officers enlisted in this vicinity seven hundred men, which he commanded as colonel. The roster does not appear on our adjutant-general's books, and we had therefore doubted the truth of his colonelcy; but documents recently produced show him at Cambridge the next spring, in command of his regiment, and with the missing roster. The energetic Col. John Walderne lived where the late Taylor Page lived, above Garrison Hill. The son of Harrison Haley, of this city, is the grandson of the colonel's grandson. An entry in Belknap's diary says: "Dec. 9, 1775, dined at Capt. John Waldron's, and prayed in the companies." The companies of the upper vicinity were, therefore, camped at Walderne's. The fathers pitched their tents there, on that high ground looking down into Dover. They saw then but one spire, if the parish church had one. They looked down on a few score of houses, "Route step, march!" As they obeyed, with flint-lock guns at a shoulder and powder-horns by their side, they passed beautiful Garrison Hill and its few houses, and the spot where Heard's garrison had stood out against the savages eighty-six years before, almost as lonely as then. From that spot they found no houses till the site of Otis' garrison, the scene of barbarous slaughter in 1689. And next was the then elegant mansion of the soldier of Louisburg, Thomas Westbrook Walderne. They crossed the then new upper bridge (no historian tells us whether its piers were of faced stone or of crib-work), and they saw only a grist-mill and a saw-mill on the dam which then fretted the waters of the Cochecho. They passed over a hill in front of the place where Varney's Block now stands, and saw one house high upon the side of the road, where Coffin's garrison had once fallen. Crossing the gully, they must have stopped in front of the first house reached, that of John Wentworth, Jr., that old house still standing next south of the Belknap Church, and saluted the youthful patriot lawyer, whose heart was alive in the cause. Then the houses became more plentiful, and they passed in front of the Dover Hotel, then in its early prosperity, and so went on the Durham road and on to the siege of Boston.

It is not the purpose to follow the history of the seven years' struggle. With the statement that the towns which made ancient Dover did their full share, we can barely mention the names of a few others who did service. We see the name of Hercules Mooney, of Lee. He had been a captain under Col. Meserve, in 1757. In 1777 he was lieutenant-colonel in Col. Long's regiment, at Ticonderoga, and in 1779 was colonel, and commanded a regiment. In Col. Long's regiment was also Lieut. Samuel Stackpole, also at Ticonderoga, and later under Washington farther south. Dr. Paul A. Stackpole, of this city, is his grandson. In September, 1776, Col. Thomas Tash, the old French war soldier, led a regiment to reinforce the Continental army, which with others joined Washington in Pennsylvania, and was at Trenton and Princeton. Joseph Smith was his adjutant, and Jonathan Chesley his quartermaster. Timothy White, who had been at the capture of Louisburg, was quartermaster of Col. Joshua Wingate's regiment, raised for Canada, but which joined the Northern army in New York. Hon. John H. White, late of this city, was Timothy White's grandson. Dr. Samuel Wigglesworth was surgeon of that regiment. Lieut. Enoch Chase, of Dover, was with Winborn Adams and Benjamin Titcomb and Frederick M. Bell, and was in the Burgoyne campaign. He was captain in 1780 and 1781. Mrs. J. B. H. Odiorne is his granddaughter. In Moses Yeaton's company, in 1775, was Lieut. Samuel Wallingford. He was captain in Col. Gilman's regiment in 1776. James Nute his first lieutenant, and was lieutenant of marines on Jones' "Ranger" in 1778, when he fell in its action with the "Drake." Col. Stephen Evans, a soldier at the capture of Louisburg, commanded a regiment at the capture of Burgoyne. He was a colonel on the staff of Gen. Whipple in 1778. He lived to a ripe old age, and his descendants are in Dover. Alpheus Chesley was lieutenant-colonel in Col. Walderne's regiment in 1776, and Jonathan Chesley was quartermaster under Col. Wingate in 1778. William Twombly was ensign in Col. Reid's regiment in 1777 and later. Numerous descendants are still here. Of the Dover company in Col. Evans' regiment in the Burgoyne campaign, James Libby was captain, Joshua Roberts, first lieutenant, Nathan Horn, second lieutenant, and Francis Warren, ensign.

The records of others, and of the rank and file from Dover in the war, have not been preserved, nor the record of the sailors who went from Dover. Of these it can only be said that the large number of volunteers from Dover proved worthy of their descent from the hardy emigrants who came from the maritime counties of England.

But three men should be mentioned who were not in the army. Col. John Wentworth, of Rollinsford, was Speaker of the House in 1771, and to the commencement of the Revolution. Of the same name with the Governor, and of the same blood, his position was peculiar. He proved true and efficient. He was president of the several Provincial Conventions which met in 1774-75. On the 11th of June, 1774, he wrote to the Massachusetts committee:

"A rivetted opinion of the good and gracious intentions of our lawful sovereign constrains me to believe that, to reinstate in his royal favor, he needs only to be divested of the unfavorable impressions of America's inveterate foes, whose secret machinations evidently tend to disunite what, when disunited, will be no longer powerful.

"The sons of freedom in New Hampshire, I believe, sympathize with your metropolis in its present distress. So mighty a display of ministerial vengeance can be accounted for only from your noble efforts to stem the torrent of oppression."

He died in 1781, and thus did not live to see our independence acknowledged.

His son, John Wentworth, Jr., of Dover, was the only lawyer in Strafford County except John Sullivan. "His father's blood," said Governor Langdon, "runs through all his veins." Hon. John Wentworth, LL.D., of Chicago, is his grandson.<sup>1</sup>

CHAPTER CXVIII.

THE PEOPLE CALLED QUAKERS—MASONIAN CLAIMS.

THE following accounts of the coming of Quakers to Dover are taken from George Bishop's "New England Judged by the Spirit of the Lord," the first part of which was published in 1661, and the second in 1667, the whole being republished in 1702-3. The reader must remember that the narrative is written by a man who was too deeply interested in the events to be an impartial historian: In the year 1662, Mary Tomkins and Alice Ambrose, who came from Old England, and George Preston and Edward Wharton, of Salem aforesaid, came to Piscataqua River, and passed up, landed at the town aforesaid (Dover), whither to go it was with them from the Lord, where they had a good opportunity in the inn with the people that resorted to them, who reasoned with them concerning their faith and hope, which to the people being made manifest, some to the Truth thereof Confessed, and others, being not able to gainsay the Truth, ran to Rayner, their Priest, and told him that such a people were come to Town; and that they had discourse with them about their Religion, and were not able to contradict what they said, and therefore desired him to come forth and help them. "Or else," said they, "we are like to be run on ground."

At this the Priest chafed and fretted, and asked the people, "Why they came amongst them?" To which they answered, "Sir, it is so we have been amongst them, and if you come not forth to help us we are on ground;" and said the Priest's wife, "Which do you like best, my Husband or the Quakers?" Said one of them, "We shall tell you that after your husband hath been with them." Whereupon in come Rayner in a fretting and forward manner, saying, "What came ye here for? see the laws of the country are against such as you are." "But what hast thou against us?" replied Mary Tomkins. "You deny magistrates," said the priest, "and ministers and the churches of Christ." "How sayest so?" replied Mary. "And you deny the Three Persons in the Trinity," said the priest. To which Mary answered, "Take notice, people, the Man falsely accuseth us, for godly Magistrates and the Ministers of Christ we own, and the Churches of Christ we own, and that there are three that bear Record in Heaven, which three are the Father, Word, and Spirit, that we own, but for the three persons in the Trinity, that's for thee to prove." "I will prove three Persons in the Trinity," said the priest. "Thou sayest so," said George Preston, "but prove it by the Scriptures." "Yes," replied Rayner, "by that will I prove it where it is said, 'And he is the express image of his Father's Person.'" "But," said one, "that is falsely translated." "Yea, it is," replied a learned man, "for in the Greek it is not Person but substance." "But," said the priest, "it is a Person, and so there is one Person." "Thou sayest so," said George. "But prove thy other Two, if thou canst," said the priest. "There are three Somethings," and so in a rage flung away, called to his people from the window to go away from amongst them; but Mary soon after got after him, and spake to him to come back, and not to leave his People amongst them he called wolves; but away packt the priest, whereupon she said unto the people, "Is not this the hireling that flees and leaves the flock?" So truth came over them all, and there was great service for the Lord, and many were convinced of the truth that day, and notwithstanding the terror of your wicked laws, many waxed bold, and invited them to their houses, and they had at that time a good and great meeting amongst them, and the power of the Lord reached many of them that day. Having had this good service at that time at Dover for the Lord, they passed away into the province of Mayne, being invited to Major Shapleigh's.

If Parson Rayner had "written a book" he would have presented a different view of this theological discussion. The account of his "fretting, etc.," is doubtless drawn from imagination; it is totally opposed to all other accounts of his character. But the Quakers did not remain long in Maine, for "towards the winter it came into the hearts of Alice Ambrose, Mary Tomkins, and Ann Coleman to go and visit the seed of God amongst them that had received the truth in Piscataqua River, where they were not long, but a flood of persecution arose by the instigation of the priest, who caused them to be apprehended by the Virtue of your Cart-Law, and order was made to whip and pass them away as followeth:

"To the constable of Dover, Hampton, Salisbury,

Newbury, Rowley, Ipswich, Wrenam, Linn, Boston, Roxbury, Dedham, and until these vagabond Quakers are out of this jurisdiction.

"You and every one of you are required in the King's Majesty's name to take these vagabond Quakers, Anna Coleman, Mary Tomkins, and Alice Ambrose, and make them fast to the cart's tail, and drawing the cart through your several towns, to whip them upon their naked backs, not exceeding ten stripes apiece on each of them in each town; and so to convey them from Constable to Constable till they are out of this jurisdiction, as you will answer it at your peril; and this shall be your warrant. Per me, Richard Walderne, at Dover, dated Dec. 22, 1662."

"A cruel warrant, through eleven townships by name and whatsoever else were in that jurisdiction to whip three tender women, and one of them little and crooked, with ten stripes apiece at each place in the bitter cold weather, through such a length of ground, near eighty miles, enough to have beaten their flesh raw and their bones. Oh, the mercies of the wicked, how are thy cruelties! The devil certainly bore through that warrant (and as men used to say) top and topgallant, no interruption. Your warrant was through these towns ten stripes apiece, enough to sink down any man whom God did not uphold; but this outruns the law in the constable, as the proverb is: there is eleven named which, according to the rate of ten in a place, is one hundred and ten apiece laid on so as, if it were possible, the knots might kiss the bones every stroke. And yet this was not enough; if any more towns through them they must go. From whom sprung this unreasonable warrant? who influenced all this? And through whose instigation were they apprehended? And who drew the warrant? Omne malum, saith the proverb, incipit a sacerdotibus, that is, all evil begins from the priest; or from the priest all evil hath its beginning. Priest Raynor aforesaid (who could not evince his own position, but as has been said, instead of proving three persons in the Trinity by the Scriptures, said 'They were three Somethings') and so fled away, being not able to stand before the power and force of truth in these servants of the Lord, and sets on this deputy magistrate, Walden, who began to tell them of your law against Quakers. Mary Tomkins replied, 'So there was a law that Daniel should not pray to his God?' 'Yes,' said Walden, 'and Daniel suffered, and so shall you' (see how he appears influenced by this priest's spirit mad and blind), and so demands Alice Ambrose her name; said, 'She is written in the Lamb's book of life.' He answered, 'Nobody here knows this book, and for this you shall suffer.' So, on a very cold day, your Deputy Walden caused these women to be stripped naked from the middle upwards, and tied to a cart, and after awhile cruelly whipped them, whilst the priest stood and looked and laughed at it, which some of the Friends seeing, testified against, for which Walden put two of them (Eliakim Wardel, of Hampton, and William Faurbish, of Dover) in the stocks. Having dispatched them in this town, and made way to carry them over the waters and through woods to another, the women denied to go unless they had a copy of their warrant; so your executioner sought to set them on horseback, but they slid off, then they endeavored to tie each to a man on horseback; that would not do neither, nor any course they took till the copy was given, inasmuch that the constable professed that he was almost wearied with them. But the copy being given them, they went with the executioner to Hampton, and through dirt and snow at Salisbury half-way the leg deep, the constable forced them after the cart's tail, at which he whipped them, under which cruelty and sore usage the tender women traversing their way through all, was a hard spectacle to those who had in them anything of tenderness; but the presence of the Lord was so with them (in the extremity of their sufferings) that they sung in the midst of them to the astonishment of their enemies.

"This Walden keeps a Saw Mill, and is a log Sawyer, but that day that he sentenced these women, his wife caused him to have hand cuffs put on.

"The tender women they tied with Ropes to the Cart at Dover to be whipped, which being very cruel, James Heard asked whether those were the Cords of the Covenant.

"The constable of Dover's name was Thomas Roberts, who looking pitifully the same night through his extreme toil to bring the servants of the Lord thither to be whipped as they had been at Dover, they were so far above his cruelty that they made some good things for his refreshment, which he took. This disgraceful sentence was executed no farther than Salisbury. But these gentle dealings did not reclaim the wanderers.

"After their release they passed a short time at Maj. Shapleigh's, in Kittery, but when 'after a little space at Maj. Shapleigh's' they returned again to Dover, the place of their late barbarous execution, and there visited their friends who had both received and suffered with them; where being met together on the next First Day of the week after their coming together, whilst they were in prayer, the constables, Thomas Roberts, aforesaid, and his brother John, like sons of Belial, having put on their old clothes with their aprons, on purpose to carry on their drudgery (taking Alice Ambrose, the one by the one arm and the other by the other arm, they unmercifully dragged her out of doors, with her face towards the snow, which was knee deep, over stumps and old trees near a mile; in the way of which, when they had wearied themselves, they commanded two others to help them, and so laid her up Prisoner in a very wicked man's house (Thomas Camy's), which when they had done, they made haste with the rest that were with them to fetch Mary Tomkins, whom, as they were dragging along with her face towards the snow, the poor Father of these two wicked constables followed after, lamenting and crying, 'Wo, that ever he was the Father of such wicked children.' (From this man Thomas Roberts, whose labor was at an end, and who had lived in Dover thirty years, and a member of their church about twenty years, they took his cow away, which gave him and his wife a little milk, for not coming to their worship.)

"So thither they hauled Mary Tomkins also, and kept them both all night in the same house, and in the morning, it being exceedingly cold, they got into a certain Boat or Canoe, or kind of Trawl hewed out of the body of a tree, which the Indians use on the water, and in it they determined to have the three women down to the harbor's mouth; and they put them in threatening that they would now so do with them that they would be troubled with them no more.

"Whither to go the three women were not willing. They forced them down a very steep place, in deep snow, and furiously they took Mary Tomkins by the arms and dragged her on her back over the stumps of trees, down a very steep hill to the water side, so that she was very much bruised and after was dying away; and Alice Ambrose they plucked violently into the water and kept swimming by the Canoe, being in danger of drowning, or to be frozen to death. (What acts of violence and cruelty are here!) Ann Coleman they put in great danger of her life also, in view of enemies in great hazard, and in all probability they had destroyed them quite according as they had said, viz.: That they would do so now as that they would be troubled with them no more; but on a sudden a great Tempest arose, and so their cruel and wicked purpose was hindered, and back they had them to the House again and kept Prisoners there till midnight, and then they cruelly turned them all out of doors in the frost and snow, Alice Ambrose's clothes being before frozen like boards, and was much and to no other thing could be attributed but to the arm of the Lord that Alice especially and the rest had not been killed; such unmercifulness to their fellow-creatures lodged in the Breasts of these wicked men who doubtless thought by these Things to have dispatched them; but the hand of the Lord, who keeps all those who wait upon him, preserved and upheld them, to whom be the glory. Amen."

Neither imprisonment, fines, nor starvation could daunt these fearless disciples of the Inner Light. Show them a whipping-post, they cling to it; a prison, they enter it; a halter, and they put their heads in it. Others fascinated by the glory of persecution came to the place of its infliction.

"George Preston, Edward Wharton, Mary Tomkins, Alice Ambrose, Alice Gary, having been at Dover [Neck], passed from thence over the water to a place called Oyster River, where, on the first day of the week, the women went to Priest Hull's place of worship; who standing before the old man he began to be troubled, and having spoken something against women's preaching, he was confounded and knew not well what to say; whereupon Mary standing up and declaring the truth to the people, John Hill in his wrath thrust her down from the place where she stood, with his own hands, and the Priest pinched her arms, whereupon they were had out of the place of worship, but in the afternoon they had their meeting, unto which came most of the Priest's Hearers, when truth gave the Priests such a blow that day, that a little while after the Priest left his Marketplace and went to the Isles of Shoals, three leagues in the sea."

Another aspirant for martyrdom soon came,—Elizabeth Hooten. Bishop says:

"Then at Dover for asking Priest Rayner aforesaid a Question, she was put in the Stocks and kept in prison four days in the cold weather, being an ancient woman which might have cost her her life, but the Lord preserved her; Richard Walden aforesaid (whose wife, it is said, begged the office of Deputy Magistrate for him that he might mischief Friends) being he who executed this cruelty through the instigation of the Priest, as before he had done to others of whom I have made mention; more cold storms she endured and Persecution in the service of the Truth in these Parts than she was able to express, being made a strength to Friends, and leaving the others without excuse."

She says of herself, "I was imprisoned also at Hampton and Dover where a wicked Constable Came with a warrant and fetched away a poor old man's heifer [Thomas Roberts' probably] who had little else to maintain him, for £3 5s. fine imposed on him by fine of 5 shillings a day for not hearing their teacher which was a horrible oppression, five times worse than the Bishop's law which is but one shilling a day for not coming to hear their Common Prayer, I being present asked him 'who made that warrant?' He said the Treasurer, Peter Coffin. But he read it 'in His Majesty's name; I asked him 'who was that Majesty?' He said 'the King.' Then said I, 'in the King's name restore the poor man his heifer, for he hath made no such law.' But he would not. So I went to Peter Coffin the Treasurer and cleared my conscience unto him and told him 'that he had done contrary to God's law and the King's law in taking away the poor man's cow, for that the King had sent to them That their Church members should not make laws by themselves excluding others.' He told me that he would take away more yet. But the Lord stopped him in that purpose.

"From him I went to Richard Walden the magistrate, to whom I said, Yesterday thou and thy wife were at a fast and to-day a poor man's cow is taken away in his Majesty's name by a Warrant. 'I asked him if he made that warrant.' He said 'no.' I said 'then make a warrant to fetch him again.'

"But he answered, 'if I had a cow he would fetch her.' I said it was contrary to God's law, and to the king's. Then said he, 'it is the Devil's law.' I answered, 'then thou may take it home; as thou sayest it is the Devil's law, so say I, for thou has said it.' Then I bid him repent and turn from these wicked laws and wicked actions, or else God would cut them off. From him I went again to the constable, and bid him return the poor man his cow again, for he did not as he would be done by. But he answered, 'if the magistrate commanded him to take away the man's life he must do it.' So you may see by what law these men act in prosecuting the just, as Walden said himself, 'it is the Devil's law.' So a company of blood-thirsty men are, etc.

"Edward Weymouth was the wicked one that dragged her. Hate-Evil Nutter, a ruling elder, was present stirring up the constables to do this thing for which no warrant had they as ever could be known, or did appear for procurring none they turned them out at Midnight, as is related."

The magistrates did not visit the burden of punishment upon strangers alone; they also dealt with their own delinquents.

For absence from public worship on the Sabbath the law required a fine of five shillings each day; for attending a Quaker meeting the penalty was the payment of ten shillings; for permitting a Quaker to rest in his house the hospitable criminal must pay forty shillings per hour. These penalties were now inflicted. The records of the court tell us that William Roberts, of Oyster River, had been absent from public worship on twenty-eight Sabbaths; William Williams, Sr., eight days; William Follett, sixteen days; James Smith, fourteen days, "and one day confest to have been at a Quaker meeting;" John Goddard had been absent four days, and had heard the Quakers twice; Thomas Roberts, Sr., thirteen days, for which his cow was taken, as has already been related; James Nute, Sr., and wife and son, twenty-six days, "and for Entertaining Quakers four hours in one day" he was fined £8; Humphrey Varney pleaded "non-convicted" for his absence, "unto whom the law was this day read and he admonished;" Mary Hanson had been absent thirteen days; Robert Burnum "had been to Strawberry Bank" to meeting, and explained the matter, "which showed him to the Court not to be obstinate;" Jelian Pinkham, thirteen days. These fines were vigorously exacted, and such treatment had precisely the effect which might have been expected. The very sufferings of the Quakers had aroused the sympathy of those who probably would never be interested in their teachings save by interest in themselves. The steadfastness with which these oppressed persons bore their afflictions did more to spread their tenets than a score of preachers. And it is worthy of notice that the Quakers have flourished in the very places of their sufferings, while many of the descendants of their persecutors embraced their faith. Of such was the posterity of Edward Weymouth and Thomas and John Roberts, who have earnestly upheld the faith that their fathers persecuted.

"In the year 1663, on the 4th day of the 5th Month, Edward Wharton, aforesaid, being at Pisetaqua River, and hearing of the cruelties done by your Court at Dover, was pressed in Spirit forthwith to repair to the Court where your Magistrates being assembled, he cried aloud and said, 'Wo to all oppressors and Persecutors, for the indignation of the Lord is against them. Therefore, Friends, whilst you have time prize the day of his patience and cease to do Evil and learn to do well, ye who spoil the poor and devour the needy, ye who lay Traps and Snares for the innocent.'

"These words of advice and council and denunciation of Judgment against that which oppresses and persecutes the innocent, were very hard to your Court, and Thomas Wiggins aforesaid (an old bloody Professor) being in a great rage cried out 'Where is the Constable? Where is the Constable?' The Marshal coming they had him to the stocks and put in his legs and so held him, till having consulted what to do, they had him in again, and then William Hathorne of Salem, who sat at that time Judge of the Court, demanded of him 'wherefore he came thither?' who answered, 'To bear my testimony for the Truth against Persecution and Violence.' Whereupon the said Wiggins fell to raging again, to whom Edward said, 'Thomas Wiggins, Thomas Wiggins, thou shouldst not rage so; thou art old and very gray, and thou art an old Persecutor; its time for thee to give over, for thou mayest be drawing near to thy grave.' Which gave an issue to an order to whip him through three towns, ten stripes at each town.

"Jerry Tibbetts Constable having received the warrant, he was bid to have Edward away and tye him to the Cart tail and whip him through the town. To which Edward answered manfully as he was passing from them, 'Friends, I fear not the worst ye may be suffered to do unto me, neither do I seek for any favor at your hands.' And to William Hathorne he said, 'O William, O William, the Lord will surely visit thee.' So to a pair of cart wheels he was tyed with a great Rope about his middle and a number of People to draw them about, when the Executor cruelly whipped him, told him that he must prepare to receive the like at the next town, which was about fourteen miles from thence through the woods; which being a long way for a man to travel on foot whose back was so torn already, to serve their pleasure in his own Execution, he told them he should not go unless they provided a horse for him or that they dragged him thither, whereupon your Executioner Complaining to your Court, this order according to this copy was issued forth as followeth:

"To the Constables of Dover or Either of them: These are to require you That whereas Edward Wharton a vagabond Quaker hath been sentenced according to Law, and at present a Horse, according to that sentence, cannot be obtained, These are in his Majesty's name to require you to commit the said Edward to the Prison at Dover, there to remain in close Custody till the next second day of the week; and there you are to Execute the said sentence according to Warrant formerly delivered unto you; hereof you are not to fail.

“DOVER the 4th of 5th Month 1661.

“WILLIAM HARTSHORN
“ELEAZER LINSLEY.”

This sentence was executed.

“At another time Thomas Newhouse, John Liddal, Edward Wharton, Jane Millard, Ann Coleman, on a first day of the week, coming to your worship-house in Dover, were by Warden's Command (of whom I have formerly spoken) haled to prison, where after he had caused them to be detained almost two weeks though he confessed, That for aught he knew they might be such as were spoken of in the 11th of Hebrews, yet he must Execute the Law against them, and so set them at Liberty. The people promised that the Priest Rayner should give them a fair reasoning when his worship was done; but he broke their word and packed away; and though the women followed him to his house yet he would not turn but clapt to his door, having taken out the key and turned Anna Coleman out of the house.”

In time the laws against the Quakers ceased to be enforced. The result of all the rigor used against them in Dover was that they eventually became a third of the entire population, a most orderly, thrifty Christian body. Their first house of worship stood on Dover Neck, on the east side; it was afterwards taken across the river into Kittery. Their second house, built before 1720, stood on the corner of Silver and High Streets, where the house of Jacob K. Purinton now stands, in which are kept the Friends' records. This meeting-house had disappeared before 1780, and the present one had been erected.

Masonian Claims.—The grant to Capt. John Mason of lands covering Dover, and overriding, apparently, the Hilton patent, descended, on his death, in 1635, to his heirs. It is needless to trace the claims, so far as Dover is concerned, prior to 1680.

On the 30th of December, 1680, Mason arrived from England to enforce his claims, bringing with him a mandamus to admit him to a seat in the Council. But instead of having the disputed claims brought to trial, he commenced issuing arbitrary orders to the people, requiring them to take leases of him, forbidding them to cut firewood and the like. Such proceedings became so intolerable that the Council forbade them, and at last Mason departed for England, exceedingly irritated at his reception. The manner in which his orders had been treated may be inferred from the following:

“Robert Mason Esqr Proprietor of the Province of New Hampshire maketh oath, That the Writing hereto annexed is a true Copy of the Declaration which he caused to be set up at the usual places in the several Towns of the sd Province, And that Major Richard Walderne did say to this deponent, That no such Papers should be set up to amuse the People and did show unto this Deponent one of the afore sd Declarations or some part thereof that he had pulled down.

“ROBERT MASON.

“R. CHAMBERLAIN, Just P.”

John Cutt died on the 27th of March, 1681, and Walderne, of Dover, who was Deputy Governor, succeeded to his office as President of the province; this post he occupied until the arrival of Edward Cranfield, 4th of October. Of course, while Walderne was at the head of the government, nothing was done regarding the claims of Mason, who was then in England. The appointment of Cranfield was made in pursuance of an arrangement in which Mason's interest in the whole province was mortgaged to him for twenty-one years. Cranfield was therefore a party directly interested in Mason's claims, and this was the cause of the rancor with which he pursued those who opposed his purposes. Only six days after his arrival he suspended Walderne and Martyn from the Council on frivolous pretexts, but this use of his power only served to render him odious in the very commencement of his administration. Ashamed, perhaps, of this action, on the 14th of November he restored them to their places.

The Assembly met on the same day, but after a short period of harmony, their opposition to his measures became so irritating that the Governor adjourned the Assembly. Its next session was no more to his mind, and he then dissolved it, an act which aroused the anger of the whole body of the people, unused as they were to such proceedings. One person, Edward Gove, a member of the Assembly from Hampton, endeavored in a half-crazy manner to excite the people to arms, but however much they were dissatisfied with the government, they had no sympathy with Gove's wild proceedings. His attempt failed entirely. He himself was brought to trial on an accusation of high treason. A special court was created Feb. 15, 1682-83, of which Walderne was judge. Gove was convicted, being the first and last man convicted of high treason in the State of New Hampshire, and the horrible sentence of the law was passed upon him by Maj. Walderne; it is said that the judge shed tears as he pronounced the sentence.

In pursuance of the previous arrangements the Governor called upon the inhabitants, Feb. 14, 1683, to take leases of Mason within one month. But this, of course, was out of the question. Within the month, however, Walderne, accompanied by John Wingate and Thomas Roberts, all large land-owners, waited upon the Governor. He directed them to see Mason; the proposition of Walderne that the whole affair should be referred to the King was refused, and there was therefore no way of avoiding a series of legal quarrels.

Walderne was again suspended from the Council, as were Martyn and Gilman. “The judicial courts were also filled with officers proper for the intended business. Some who had always been disaffected to the country, and others who had been awed by threats and promises, took leases from Mason, and these served for under-sheriffs, jurors, evidences, and other necessary persons.

"Things being thus prepared, Mason began his law-suits by a writ against Maj. Walderne (who had always distinguished himself in opposition to his claim) for holding lands and felling timber to the amount of four thousand pounds. The major appeared in court and challenged every one of the jury as interested persons, some of them having taken leases of Mason, and all of them having lands which he claimed. The judge then caused the oath of voire dire to be administered to each juror, purporting 'that he was not concerned in the lands in question, and that he should neither gain nor lose by the cause.' Upon which the major said aloud to the people present, 'that his was a leading case, and that if he were cast they must all become tenants of Mason, and that all persons in the province being interested, none of them could legally be of the jury.' The cause, however, went on, but he made no defense, asserted no title, and gave no evidence. Judgment was given against him, and at the next Court of Sessions he was fined for 'mutinous and seditious words.'"

Suits were instituted against many other land-owners, and decided in the same summary manner. In Dover, besides Walderne, there were John Heard, Sr., William Horne, Jenkin Jones, William Furlur, Jr., John Hall, Jr., Joseph Field, Nathaniel Hill, James Huckins, William Tasker, Zachary Field, Philip Chesley, Jr., Thomas Chesley, Robert Barnham, Anthony Nutter, William Furbur, Sr., Thomas Paine, Charles Adams, Thomas Edgerly, Henry Longstaffe, Thomas Stevenson, John Meader, John Woodman, John Windict, John Davis, Sr., Joseph Beard, John Roberts, Joseph Stevenson, Samuel Hill, Philip Lewis, John Gerrish, John Hill, Joseph Hall, Thomas Roberts, Sr., and perhaps others, who were thus declared dispossessed. From seven to twelve cases were dispatched each day. Some executions were levied, but the officers could neither retain possession nor find purchasers, so that the property soon reverted to its owners. These matters went on until the representations of Nathaniel Weare so influenced the Board of Trade that they ordered Cranfield to suspend the suits. Executions, however, were issued after this; the success which they met with may be learned from an incident which occurred in Dover: Certain officers, attempting to levy an execution, were driven off; they returned on the Sabbath, with warrants to apprehend the rioters; a tumult ensued, which was ended by a young girl's knocking down one of the officers with her Bible; such a spirit it was useless to resist.

The suits were suspended, however, and were not resumed until long after Walderne's death. It is unnecessary for us, therefore, to say more than that in the final decision the rights of the colonists were fully preserved. The "proprietors," so called, who bought out the Masonian heirs or holders in the next century, quit-claimed all settled lands at once; and thus ended the controversy.

CHAPTER CXCIX.

PROGRESS FROM THE REVOLUTION.

THE population of the town in 1776 was less than 1700. By a census of the State, taken in the previous year "for the purpose of establishing an adequate representation of the people," Dover was returned as containing males under sixteen years of age, 410; males from sixteen years of age to fifty, not in the army, 342; males above fifty years of age, 74; persons gone in the army, 28; all females, 786; negroes and slaves for life, 26. Total population, 1666.

All of the working members of this community were mainly engaged in the cultivation of the soil, and a few of them added thereto the business of sawing logs and grinding corn. A small number perhaps may have been called mechanics,—tanning the leather and making the shoes of their neighbors, shoeing their cattle, building their houses and small boats for the river, etc., when there was any call for such labor. Some lumber business still remained; some ship-building was also carried on at Dover Point; but all of them relied mainly upon the produce of the land for support; for here, as elsewhere, a man was hardly considered a desirable acquisition to the town unless he had an interest in the soil. As early as 1666 the town had voted that no more persons should be admitted to citizenship until all former grants had been laid out and recorded on the town's book, and a list made out of all inhabitants, so that "the town may see how many we are to take care of."

There was then little which might properly be called a village in the town. Dover Neck, where the settlers of 1633 had first laid out a city, which was never built, then, as it had for one hundred and fifty years, contained a considerable population. But after Cochecho, as that part of the town around the falls was called, succeeded, in 1713, in removing the place of meeting on the Sabbath by building the new meeting-house at Pine Hill, the prestige of the Neck, as the seat of government, which it had maintained for nearly a century, departed. South of the river, stretching from what is now Central Square to the road beyond Pine Hill, there may have been twenty dwelling-houses. On what is now called Silver Street there were half a dozen more. On the north side of the river, in addition to the Walderne house, standing just back of where Morrill's Block now stands, there were but four other houses on all the territory now comprising the most thickly-settled section of the city. The landing was principally used as a depot for the lumber and for tying up the boats of those of the inhabitants who possessed boats, and there was in addition a few scattered trees, remnants of the forests which once covered it, and a cooper's shop only. These were the main, if not the only, roads for travel through the town. Of the buildings then standing upon them, not more than half a dozen now remain. The long winding street from Garrison Hill through the landing to Pine Hill still exists, but the whole conformation of the land over which it passes has been greatly changed. Hills have been dug down and ravines filled up, if the crooked places have not always been made straight, not only in the vicinity of the falls, but elsewhere along its course, until hardly one stone remains upon another, or one shovelful of earth rests where it did at that time.

The only public buildings in the place were the meeting-house, built in 1758, the predecessor of the present house at the Corner; the Friends' meeting-house, now standing, built in 1779; the jail, of unknown antiquity, which was located where Daniel Niles' house now stands; and a school-house, which stood on or near the spot where the building so long devoted to the purpose of "teaching the young idea how to shoot" still stands, though now used as a ward house.

At the Falls, near the upper bridge, besides the Walderne house already referred to, its then occupant, Thomas Westbrook Walderne, the fourth in descent from Maj. Richard Walderne, the first proprietor, had a saw- and grist-mill. His barns occupied the present site of the American House, and his possessions stretched from the river far away towards Garrison Hill. Opposite to him, on the south side of the river, the descendants of old Peter Coffin were still lords of the soil, holding it so tenaciously that when, in 1820 or thereabouts, the town laid out Washington Street, they refused for a long time to accept the money which was awarded them as damages, considering it little less than sacrilege to alienate any part of the land which their far-off ancestor had handed down to them. Within the last forty years, Coffin's woods, now covered in part by streets and residences and the railroad track, Coffin's orchard of antediluvian apple-trees, occupying all the space from Washington up to and beyond Orchard Street, and jutting down into the very heart of the city, and Coffin's Brook, over which the City Hall has been erected, have disappeared, but the brook, covered from view, still flows on.

On all the territory now comprising the compact part of the city there must in 1776 have been less than fifty families. The old Dover Hotel, or some parts of it, then Gage's tavern, stood where it now stands. Rev. Jeremy Belknap, afterwards known as the "Historian of New Hampshire," was the minister in the town, living in the house which he built, and which was taken down to make place for the Belknap school-house. Col. Thomas W. Walderne, Col. Otis Baker, Col. John Gage, Capt. Stephen Evans, Capt. Caleb Hodgdon, Capt. Joshua Wentworth, and Capt. John Walderne were its most prominent inhabitants, serving as officers in the provincial militia, as moderators at town-meetings, as selectmen, and as representatives in the Provincial Legislature. John Wentworth, Jr., was the only lawyer. John Sullivan, of Durham (once a part of Dover), was the only other lawyer of the county. He was drilling a company of minute-men, and he became a major-general in the Revolution.

There was little trade in the town; the few articles for consumption or wear not produced at home were bought of itinerant dealers or procured at Portsmouth, which with Exeter, then the seat of the provincial government, was the residence of the principal men of the State. The spoils of Governor Wentworth's seat, at Wolfborough, consisting, among other things, of "a valuable collection of books and two fine weather-glasses," having been confiscated and advertised by the Committee of Safety for sale in Dover, the Assembly, "considering that they would be more likely to sell at a much greater advantage at Exeter, where there was a constant resort of people from other towns," ordered the sale to be adjourned to that place. The keys of a store which was opened here in 1776, by James McMarster, of Portsmouth, and put in charge of one Peter Mitchell, were taken from him by the Committee of Safety, and his goods confiscated because of his disloyalty to the patriot cause; and stringent resolutions were passed in town-meeting against dealing with hawkers, peddlers, and petty chapmen, who were represented as "strolling through the country with goods, wares, and merchandise, much of it undoubtedly forwarded by enemies of the country." Innholders, especially, were forbidden to entertain such persons under the penalty of having their licenses taken from them.

Though the province had been divided into counties, and Strafford County had been organized in 1771, it was not until 1773 that it had its separate courts, all its judicial business being transacted in Rockingham County, on account of the sparseness of the population here.

Such was the condition of Dover, briefly sketched, when the Revolution commenced and the country entered upon the great struggle for independence. Early in the contest the people had assembled in town-meeting, and with great unanimity pledged their best efforts for their country's success, and they made this resolution good by contributing to the extent of their ability both of men and money to secure it.

The close of the war of the Revolution left the country poor and deeply in debt, with a worthless currency, and the people distressed for the means of paying their taxes and their private obligations. Then, as in recent times, the effects of war were widely felt long after the cessation of hostilities, and it was not until after the establishment of the Constitution that the prosperity and business of the country began to revive.

The ratification of this new bond of union by the requisite number of States was hailed in Dover, as elsewhere, with great rejoicings.

Dover then had no newspaper, and some correspondent here sent the subjoined notice of the great occasion to the newspaper at Portsmouth, from which it was copied into the Salem Mercury. The printer unfortunately considered his space of more importance than the order of procession, omitted it in the publication, and there is now no living witness of the event who can supply it:

"PORTSMOUTH, July 1st. A Correspondent has favoured us with the following sketch of the Procession at Dover, in Consequence of having the most important Pillar in Federal Edifice Erected in New Hampshire. In the afternoon of Tuesday last, a number of gentlemen of that town assembled, and being embodied, Nine Cannon were discharged, at the distance of nine minutes from each other—the nine States in the Union were given as toasts, one immediately preceding each Cannon, in the order they adopted the Constitution, and were succeeded by Nine Cheers.

"The Corps of Light Horse and a company on foot joined—the member of the Convention from Dover, was then waited on, and a toast was given as a testimonial of thanks, for his services and succeeded by Musick and a Levee—by Tom horse and foot. [Here follows an account of the order of procession.] After passing the town, animated by the approving smiles of the ladies present—a semicircle was formed near the meeting-house, where Nine Cannon were again discharged, and nine toasts were publicly given. After repeated cheers and expressions of unadulterated joy, the Company received an invitation to the Hall-Chamber, where nine Flower bowls, and four Empty ones stood prepared for their reception, and Nine social Songs were sung, which closed the Evening in harmony."

The four empty bowls were symbolic of the four States which had not at that time ratified the Constitution, as the nine flowing ones were of those which had. What added interest to the occasion was the fact that New Hampshire was the ninth State which ratified the great charter, and the ninth State made the Union of the States a living reality.

In 1790, when the census was first taken by authority of Congress, Dover had a population of nineteen hundred and ninety-eight, having increased but one hundred and thirty-two in the fifteen previous years. In 1800 the number was two thousand and sixty-two, an addition of sixty-four only.

Slavery had in a great measure disappeared during the Revolution, and was finally extinguished on the adoption of the State Constitution. Some of those held to service had purchased their freedom, some had taken it by going abroad and failing to return, others had been voluntarily emancipated. Thomas Westbrook Wadterne, in his will, dated Aug. 7, 1779, bequeaths to heirs his negro Dinah and her two children, Chloe and Plato. The framers of the Constitution, while making provision for the freedom of those born from and after its adoption, appear to have thought it expedient to leave the few that remained nominally the property of those who had profited by their services, so far at least as to require them to support those unable to support themselves, instead of leaving them to become town paupers. This is apparent from the fact that in 1798, on the petition of a citizen to have the town "accountable for the future maintenance of a poor negro woman then in his family," the town voted that it would not be account-

During this period the town was slowly recovering from the depression consequent on the war. Dr. Dwight, in his travels through New England in 1796, in recording his impressions of the town, uses the following language: "The site of Dover is chiefly a declivity. The buildings are substantial and decent, but formed with very little taste or beauty. A small number of them only are painted, and most of these with a dull, disagreeable color. There is nothing sprightly in the appearance of the town, except the activity of its inhabitants. The commerce of Dover consists chiefly in lumber. The material is daily diminishing, and in a short time will probably fail. Whether a substitute can be found by the inhabitants, I am ignorant."

In 1792 the first newspaper published in the place appeared, and we are able to glean from its columns some idea of what Dover was doing. Trade and a variety of mechanical pursuits had been added to its industry. The selectmen were directed by a vote of the town to sell lots on the Landing, for the purpose of promoting and encouraging trade. Many lots were thus disposed of, stores were built, and business began to grow up in that locality. The bridge over the Piscataqua, leading from Durham to Newington, and connecting Dover with Portsmouth, was opened. A post-office was established, a court-house was built in 1791, and is still standing, turned half round and now cut up into cellings. In that court-house used to be heard Jeremiah Smith, Webster, Mason, and Bartlett. The Strafford Bank was incorporated. The Legislature, for the first and last time in its history, held its session here in 1792. Ship-building to some extent was followed. Dover merchants shipped lumber and other products to the West Indies, receiving in return molasses, sugar, rum, etc. Some of them imported goods directly from Europe, and advertised them for sale by the cargo. The Landing at this time first became the centre of business, and continued for years the principal mart of trade. Its merchants dealt with all the surrounding country up to and beyond the "Pond" (in modern parlance Winnepesaukee Lake) and the White Mountains. On a winter's day, as old people have often related, the country teams coming into town in the morning frequently extended from Ela's tavern to near the foot of Garrison Hill.

In 1810 the population of the town had increased to two thousand two hundred and twenty-eight. Dr. Dwight, who again visited Dover about this time, says, "I found Dover considerably improved since my last visit, and, what was not a little gratifying to me, furnished with a good minister of the gospel."

The embargo and the war of 1812 interfering with mercantile pursuits, the business men of the town embarked in other industries. In 1812 the Dover Cotton-Factory was incorporated, with a capital of fifty thousand dollars, and, as the Lower Falls were supposed to be fully occupied with the saw- and grist-mills thereon, the first factory was built two miles up the river, and was long known as the Upper factory. This was built in 1812, and, like most new enterprises, was but moderately successful to its projectors. In 1821 a nail-factory was established at the Lower Falls, at which one thousand tons of iron were rolled and seven hundred tons manufactured into nails annually, but this business becoming unprofitable it was abandoned.

At this time (1821) the Dover Cotton-Factory, having obtained possession of the Lower Falls, so long the property chiefly of the Waldron family, enlarged their operations. They increased their capital to five hundred thousand dollars, and built the first cotton-mill erected in the village. This is now known as No. 2, having been so called when erected to distinguish it from the mill at the Upper Falls, which was long since taken down.

The remaining history of this manufacture, which transformed Dover into a city, will be given farther on.

The rapid advancement of the town in wealth and population dates from the establishment of this great enterprise. In 1820 the population was 2870. Within the next ten years these numbers had nearly doubled, the census of 1830 showing the population to be 5449, while the taxable property had more than doubled. In this time many new streets had been laid out and new bridges built, hundreds of new dwellings had been erected, five or six new religious societies organized and new churches built. In 1823 the Dover Bank and the Savings-Bank of the county of Strafford were chartered, the Dover Aqueduct Company incorporated, and the Strafford Guards organized. Two additional newspapers (the Gazette in 1825, and the Enquirer in 1828) had been established to aid the Dover Sun (which for thirty years had shone for all) in giving light to the people. Old Dover, after a life of two centuries, had passed away, and a new town with a new population and new industries had come into existence. Previous to this time it had been exceeded in population not only by Portsmouth, but by Gilmanton, Sanbornton, and several other farming towns in the State which had not been settled for more than one hundred years after the Hiltons landed at Dover Point, but now it became second only to Portsmouth, a position which it maintained for nearly twenty years, or until the sudden growth of Manchester made that the metropolitan city of New Hampshire.

In 1840 the population of Dover had increased to 6458, and its proportion of the State tax from $11,17 in 1820 to $30,98. In 1850 the population was 8186; the valuation $2,917,598.

During the first of these decades (1830 to 1840) business was somewhat affected from various causes. The disastrous effects of Eastern land speculations, the excitement in relation to nullification and the tariff, the suspension of specie payments and the monetary revulsions which followed crippled business and retarded and in some cases put an end to enterprises here as well as elsewhere in the country. Many manufacturing establishments suspended operations for a season, wages in others were reduced, and turnouts among the operatives added to the derangement. All the mills in Dover were for a time idle. The population and business of the town, however, made a handsome increase in these ten years, though not in so great a ratio as in the previous ten. Many handsome dwellings were erected, and several new business blocks were added to those previously built.

In 1841 the opening of the Boston and Maine Railroad, and the construction a few years after of the Cochecho Railroad to Alton, to both of which Dover people contributed liberally, had a marked effect upon the business of the town. While its local trade and interests were on the increase, its importance as a distributing point for interior trade declined. The Dover Packet Company, which had for many years given life and activity to the wharves and store-houses on the river, soon discharged its last cargo, the Landing ceased to be the centre of business, which from this time gathered around the railroad station and the streets leading most directly to it.

The Dover Packet Company, when in its prosperity, was the only channel of intercourse between Dover and the business world. With all the freight of the manufacturing company and that of the business men of the place to carry, it employed quite a number of coasting vessels, and its commerce with Boston was larger than that of any other place east of New York except Portsmouth. A Boston paper of the period remarks with satisfaction at the growing importance of the manufacturing business, when a large portion of the cotton goods consumed in the country were imported, that "the last Dover packet from New Hampshire brought nearly as many cotton and woolen goods to this market as were brought by the packet-ship 'Dover,' and more than were brought by the packet 'New England,' from Liverpool. Cotton goods which were purchased in England for thirty-eight cents, and thought remarkably cheap, were not better cottons than now can be purchased here at twenty cents." Any other highway for the transportation of heavy goods than that of water was then undreamed of. Surveys for a canal from Dover to the lake had been made, and the feasibility of building it was a matter of frequent discussion. A steamboat was put upon the lake in 1833 by the aid, in part, of the business men of Dover. In 1836 an appropriation of ten thousand dollars was obtained from the general government for improving the navigation of the Cochecho. The era of railroads, however, was approaching; notices began to appear in the papers that a road was in the process of construction from Wilmington to Andover, meetings were held to aid in its continuance to Dover, and on the 31st of August, 1835, looks for subscriptions to its stock were opened in Dover. With the decline of its commerce, ship-building as an art died out on the Cochecho. The last vessel of any considerable size built here, a ship of six hundred tons, was launched Sept. 14, 1837, by Capt. Robert Rogers, from his yard near the Gulf.

In 1842 the town-hall building, with accommodations for the county courts, county offices, town officers, etc., was built at an expense of more than $20,000; to be rebuilt and enlarged in 1867, after being badly damaged by fire, at a cost of more than $50,000.

In 1847 the introduction of the shoe manufacture and trade for the Southern and Western markets added largely to the business of the place, employing after a few years a large capital, and in a good season more workmen than any other industry.

The Sawyer Woolen-Mills, another enterprise of the last twenty-five years, and of growing importance, has built up a new village in the south part of the city. Its history will be given farther on.

In 1855 the town government, after an existence of two hundred and twenty-two years, or from 1633, was superseded by a city organization.

With the city government came in the use of gas in lighting the streets and dwellings, improved sidewalks, a police court, a more efficient administration of the laws, and other "city institutions," quiet and orderly elections included,—the business of voting being dispatched in a day instead of occupying two or three as frequently occurred under the town organization,—the only drawback being the usual penalty of greatness, an increase of taxation.

In 1860 the population of the city was eight thousand five hundred and two; its valuation, $3,884,842. In 1870 the number of inhabitants was nine thousand two hundred and ninety-four; the valuation, $5,018,320, showing a comparatively small increase during the ten years, which will be long remembered for the great war for the preservation of the Union which was fought to a successful issue, and the great sacrifice of life and property which was required.

To raise and put its quota into the service, under the various calls which were issued, the city advanced upwards of $250,000, increasing its expenditures from $59,272 in 1860 to $233,462 in 1865.

In 1871 Congress appropriated $10,000 for the purpose of removing obstructions in Cochecho River. In 1872 an additional sum of $10,000 was granted, followed by a like amount in each of the two following years. In 1875 the sum was increased to $25,000, and later a further sum of $15,000, which gave free access to all vessels which are employed in the coal and other freighting business upon the river.

In November, 1872, ground was broken for the construction of the Portsmouth and Dover Railroad, an enterprise which had been in contemplation for more than twenty years. The road was built in that and the following year, and opened for travel in February, 1874, costing some $800,000, of which sum the city, in its municipal capacity, contributed $225,000, while many of its citizens made liberal private subscriptions.

In March, 1875, the "Dover Building Association" was organized with a capital of $10,000. Since that time it has invested between thirty and forty thousand dollars in real estate, building about thirty dwelling-houses, many of which have already been satisfactorily disposed of, affording handsome dividends to the stockholders in the enterprise, and furnishing desirable tenements to a valuable class of population.

In 1876 the valuation of the city for purposes of taxation had increased to $7,339,828. Add to this the investments in railroads, in government bonds, and other property exempt from taxation, and the whole amount will reach, if it does not exceed, ten millions of dollars, or not less than $1000 to each of the population on an even divide, could such a distribution be made.

CHAPTER CXX.

THE MANUFACTURING INTEREST.

The Lower Falls and their Mills.—Up to the year 1642 the falls had run undisturbed. In that year, the first in which we have any notice of them, we find, 1st 6th mo., 1642, that the town by grant of that date, and again by subsequent grants 30th 6th mo., 1643, conveyed to Richard Walderne, who had come here to seek his fortune, the falls, fifty acres of land on the north side, and sixty acres on the south. Here the major built a mill.

He built mills on both sides of the river. On the 20th of December, 1649, the major sold to Joseph Austin, the ancestor of all the Austins hereabouts, for twenty-five pounds, one-quarter part of the saw-mill on the south side, with all appurtenance.

The remainder he held until the 27th of May, 1671, when he sold to Peter Coffin another quarter of the south side privilege.

The major himself lived about where the north side of Central Avenue is, a few rods, perhaps, from Central Street. No other house or buildings, save his outbuildings, stood on the west side of Central and Franklin Streets, from the river to Otis' garrison, just above Brick Street, for perhaps two hundred years. That property, together with the whole of the north side mill privilege and the half of the south side, on the old major's violent death, in 1689, descended to his only son, Richard. Richard lived here a portion of his life, but by and by moved to Portsmouth.

He devised the property by will, April 6, 1730, to his son Richard, the secretary of the province, at whose death, Aug. 23, 1753, it descended to the secretary's sons, Thomas Westbrook and George. Thomas W. lived in the mansion built on the old property, and which stood exactly back of Morrill's Block, a few feet west, with the end lapping over the line into Second Street. A handsome yard was in front, as it faced the east, and its garden ran down to the river; the old house still stands near by. Thomas W. bought out his brother George's right to the mill and homestead 21st of November, 1758, and by will dated 7th of August, 1779 (proved 8th of June, 1785), devised it to his two sons, Daniel and Charles, or to either survivor in case the other died without lawful issue before attaining the age of twenty-one. Charles did so die, and Daniel came into possession. Daniel lived in the old house. He mortgaged, by deeds dated 29th of April, 1811, and 18th of December, 1815, the falls and all the land on the north side of the river, excepting the small lot then in possession of Abigail Boardman (next below the Mark Walker lot), to the New Hampshire Strafford Bank; the bank came into possession 31st of January, 1820, and conveyed the whole to William Payne, of Boston, 23d of April, 1821, who obtained release of dower the same day. Thus passed out of the Waddron possession the lands lying north of the river and west of Main Street to the river, as the north boundary of the "Horne lot" goes, then following of the river half the way to Whittier's fall till it met the Horne property, then running a little east of north till it met the John Waddron property, thence east to the road, and down the road to the west side of Main Street again. This did not include their property on the east of Main Street nor south of the river.

So far as is now known, no buildings stood on the north side of the falls in the "Factory Square" except mills for a great many years. Over a hundred years ago the Waddrons erected a building which was used as a tavern by Capt. Thomas Shannon. This stood near the present gate, but a little nearer the river, and faced Central Street. Capt. Shannon left it, however, about 1796, and went to Rochester Plains, continuing in the same business. It was afterwards occupied by tenants.

Samuel Ricker and his family occupied it once. Other tenants succeeded, but its dilapidated condition rendered it a poor residence. A "mill-house," built probably earlier than the Shannon house, stood a rod or two east of the north end of that building. It was a structure of logs, and in later days was inaccurately known as the "garrison house." It had been used for millers' families. These, with the grist- and saw-mills, were all which the company found on the northern side of the mill property. The company took these away, and placed their "counting-room" about where the gate now is, north of the river. They built a blacksmith-shop running from near the "counting-room" (a gate between) almost to the river. These are now all gone, but the shed running north from the gate, which was built at an early date, still remains.

The nail-factory, the first substantial in the new regime, still standing and occupied for shops, was erected in 1821. The business proved unprofitable, and was abandoned in 1826. The machine-shop was a more modern affair, and the present "wood shop" replaced the old one at too recent a date to be worth attending to. The brick store now occupied by the firm of Moulton & Cate was occupied for the company by John B. H. Odiorne as a general variety store. Here they disposed of their own goods in part and did a general business with up country, as was the custom in the early history of manufacturing. As experience showed the inconveniences of this system, and especially after the company had sunk a fortune in the business, the trade was given up. Odiorne and his brother-in-law, Samuel W. Carr, as Odiorne & Carr, went on on their own account, but probably with no great success. After they gave up business the building was used for many years as the store-house of the company's goods, sometimes an office or two being let, and sometimes not. By and by, Benjamin Barker, who came from Rochester, hired it. Since his return thither it has had various tenants, but it is only within a few years that his enterprise has given it a lively appearance.

This land was not all Waddron property. Striking a line from the counting-room gate or a little south, on Central Street, about east to the river, and we have two sections,—the upper one was the Waddron privilege, the lower was the town's,—and after the opening of Washington Street and the building of the lower bridge, was cut and sold as house lots; to this, by and by. Of that part of the Waddron grant which lay on the south side of the river, as just described, Maj. Walderne sold one-quarter to Joseph Austin, Dec. 20, 1649. This quarter descended by inheritance to his son, Thomas Austin; Thomas conveyed it, May 14, 1719, by deed, to son Joseph; from him, either by a daughter's marriage or some other way not recorded, it passed to the hands of Tristram Coffin, of Dover, who, by will dated April 27, 1761, and proved Aug. 26, 1761, devised it to his son Eliphalet (brother to Aunt Debby and Mrs. Bickford); he sold it, Nov. 3, 1795, to Jacob Currier. Another quarter was sold by Maj. Walderne to old Peter Coffin, May 27, 1671. Old Peter conveyed it, Nov. 24, 1714, to his grandson, Eliphalet Coffin, of Exeter, who, by will proved Sept. 13, 1736, devised the said interest to his son, Rev. Peter Coffin, of Kingston, who, Oct. 21, 1741, conveyed the said part, together with his share of what was saved out of the mill "that was lately carried away," to John Gage, of Dover. John Gage having died, his estate was divided, Nov. 18, 1794, between Capt. John Gage, Jonathan Gage, Moses Gage, and Sarah, wife of Nathan Horne; the quarter of the mill privilege fell to Capt. John and Jonathan jointly.

In a further division between the two, made March 17, 1795, the "quarter" was released to John; John sold it, July 25, 1795, for fifty pounds to John Phillips Gilman, of Dover, so that at the beginning of the year 1796 the south side was owned half by the heirs of Thomas W. Waldron, a quarter by John P. Gilman, and a quarter by Jacob Currier.

On the 14th of May, 1796, the property was divided. Daniel Waldron's half was next to Central Street, running ten or twelve rods on that street, and about nine down the river. Currier and Gilman took the other half, almost where the Factory bridge stands, having also a right of way through Waldron's land and a right to build flumes from the dam.

On the 6th of May, 1797, Currier and Gilman also divided, in a way impossible to be made intelligible, and of no sort of use now if it could be. Gilman sold a part of his share, 21st of August, 1798, to Samuel Gerrish, Jr.; on Gerrish's death it descended to his children, John and Alphonso, and is sold by virtue of license, 29th of April, 1811, to Daniel L. Currier, an oil-mill then standing there.

Currier conveyed it by deed, 24th of March, 1821, to John Williams, of Boston, and Isaac Wendell, of Dover, who conveyed it, 28th of April, 1821, to William Payne, of Boston. Gilman conveyed the residue of his share to John Gage, 21st of August, 1798, whose daughter, Mary Wingate Gage, inherited it, on whose account it was sold by license to Jacob M. Currier, who included it in his sale 26th March, 1821, as below.

Jacob Currier conveyed out of his share, 31st of October, 1801, to Daniel L. Currier, a privilege for a fulling-mill, who conveyed it to Ephraim Foss, Jr., who seems to have conveyed it to Jacob M. Currier, subject to lease, which expired 1st of February, 1824. On the 20th of May, 1815, Jacob Currier sold to William Currier a quarter of an oil-mill standing on the premises, which said William conveyed, 25th of May, 1820, to Jacob M. Currier; Jacob Currier also conveyed all his remaining interest, 28th of January, 1818, to Jacob M. Currier, who thus owned the whole quarter, and who conveyed said quarter to William Payne, 26th of March, 1821.

The upper part of the south side, which, in the division of 14th of May, 1796, was assigned to Daniel Waldron, he sold, 21st of January, 1819, to Jonathan Locke, the tavern-keeper. Locke sold it, 30th of April, 1821, to William Payne. Thus the whole mill property came into the hands of William Payne, who was a wealthy citizen of Boston, and the first president of the Dover Factory Company, and who conveyed the whole to the company, with other lands hereabouts, 27th of April, 1822, and thus the water of Maj. Waldron's mill privilege was set to turning spindles. As to the buildings which have stood on this south side tract prior to its occupation for cotton-factories, it is hard to be very specific. There can be traced an "old" saw-mill there in 1649; a saw-mill in 1671, in 1719, and in 1735; an oil-mill in 1798, 1806, 1811, 1815, and 1818; a grist-mill in 1798 and 1818; a carding-machine "in the building containing and covering said grist-mill and oil-mill" on Jacob Currier's part in 1818; Jeremiah Stickney also had a card-factory there somewhere between 1810 and 1820, and Ephraim Foss, Jr., had a fulling-mill about where No. 3 picker stands, from 1821, and doubtless earlier, to 1st of February, 1824.

The "Dover Cotton Factory" was incorporated Dec. 15, 1812, with a capital of fifty thousand dollars, which built in 1815 the No. 1 factory at "Upper Factory" village; it was a wooden structure, and has long since disappeared. The company had its capital enlarged, June 21, 1821, to five hundred thousand dollars, about the time when it bought up the titles of the lower falls, as described above. The capital was enlarged, June 17, 1823, to one million dollars, and the name changed to "Dover Manufacturing Company." The capital was again enlarged, June 20, 1826, to one million five hundred thousand dollars, but the company did not succeed, and a new company, the present one, the "Cocheo Manufacturing Company," was incorporated June 27, 1827, with a capital of one million five hundred thousand dollars, which purchased of the old company all their works and personal property.

No. 2 was built in 1822, but this building ceased to be called No. 2 when the new No. 2 (first section), on north side of river, was opened for work in 1881.

The old No. 3 was occupied in 1823, and was superseded by the new No. 2 (second section), which began work in 1882.

No. 4 was opened in 1825, and No. 5 in its present form, which replaced the old printery in 1850. The new No. 1, standing on the south side of Washington Street, was finished in 1878.

The manufacture of cloth began under the care of John Williams, the first agent. He was the founder of this industry here, and thus of Dover's modern prosperity. It was his indefatigable activity which turned capital to these falls. When the corner-stone of the "old mill factory" was laid, it received the inscription:

"July 4th, A. D. 1821.
W. A. W."

This meant John Williams and Isaac Wendell. Mr. Williams had secured the introduction of the cotton manufacture, and remained the agent of the corporation which had begun at "Upper Factory." John Williams was its founder; Moses Paul, clerk when the work came to the lower falls; John Chase, its first general mechanical superintendent; Andrew Steele, its first master-mechanic; Samuel Dunster (still living in Attleboro', Mass.), the builder of the first practical machinery of the calico printery.

John Williams was succeeded by James F. Curtis, who remained until 1834, when Moses Paul became agent. Moses Paul was one of Dover's best citizens. Born in Waterborough, Me., 28th of March, 1798, he was nine years of age when the family came to this Dover, with whose prosperity he was to be so thoroughly identified. He was fifteen years of age when he entered the employ of his uncle, John Williams, twenty-six years of age when he was promoted to be superintendent of the mill at Upper Factory, thirty years of age when he was superintendent of the mills on the lower falls, thirty-six years of age when he became agent, and it was after twenty-six years of this latter service that he died, universally lamented, July 9, 1860. He was succeeded, Aug. 1, 1860, by the present agent, Zimri S. Wallingford, who had been superintendent from 1849, and over the mechanical department five years previous. The success of his administration is visible. The enlargement of the work is seen in the fact that when he took charge the mills had a so-called capacity of fifty-seven thousand spindles; their present capacity one hundred and twenty thousand. Twelve hundred operators are on the books of his charge.

The first printing of calico in these works was under the superintendence of Dr. A. L. Porter, who was succeeded, before 1830, by John Duxbury, a thoroughly experienced printer in England. His successors have been George Mathewson, John Braecwell, and the present superintendent, Washington Anderton, who took charge in 1880. The original printery was in the present No. 5, and other buildings near but now removed.

In 1832 it was said:

"The principal manufacture is fine cotton cloth, No. 40, for calicoes, which are bleached and printed on the spot; No. 18, sheeting, and No. 30, shirting, also are made. The number of people employed in these three cotton mills, machine-shops, and calico-printing establishments is eight hundred females and three hundred men and boys. These mills consume about two thousand six hundred bales of cotton, and turn out four and a half million yards of cloth annually, or about fifteen thousand yards daily. The calico-works made into fine prints and dyed goods (colored cambries) two thousand five hundred pieces of twenty-eight yards each, or seventy thousand yards, per week. The following articles, with many others not specified, were used by this establishment in one year:

Cash paid for wages .....	$168,616.00
Fine wood produced in New Hampshire, 2040 cords .....	11,820.00
Hard wood produced in New Hampshire, 685 cords .....	2,740.00

Cow manure produced in New Hampshire, 30,565 bushels .....	3,056.50
Oil produced in Massachusetts, 8349 gallons .....	5,954.38
Flour produced in New York and Maryland, 548 barrels .....	2,650.00
Amount paid for freight .....	13,000.00

Of the report of the treasurer, Haward Stockton, in 1882, a brief abstract of some of its important features: "To the stockholders of the Cochecho Manufacturing Company. You have before you the accounts containing the results of the business of the company for the year ending April 29, 1882. 12,003 bales of cotton were purchased, 12,064 used, the price averaging 11 cents (nearly). The mills manufactured 29,767,417 yards of cloth. Besides the manufactured cloth, 9,179,145 yards of goods were purchased for printing. The whole quantity printed is 38,825,276 yards. The balance of profit and loss account is 896,184.90, which makes the net profit for the year $498,740.87. Of this we have paid $150,000 in dividends, and appropriated the rest to rebuilding mills. The middle section of new mill No. 2 has been built and is in successful operation, but the small profit now made on prints does not warrant any further outlay at present, and the construction of the south section has been deferred." Clerk, Z. S. Wallingford; Treasurer, Haward Stockton; Directors, Amos A. Lawrence, John A. Burnham, J. Ingersoll Bowditch, T. Jefferson Coolidge, John McDuffee, John L. Gardner, Jr., Haward Stockton.

Sawyer Woolen-Mills.—These mills are situated in Dover, on the Bellamy Bank River, the water-power of the three lower falls of which is controlled and utilized by this company, as is also the reservoir in Barrington, which was built in 1863-64, and enlarged in 1881, with capacity of about four hundred and fifty acres. Tide-water reaches to the lower mill, and is navigable for coal barges and sloops of moderate capacity. The Portsmouth and Dover branch of the Eastern Railroad has a station at these mills, which is about sixty-six miles from Boston, the freight of which can be discharged directly into the warehouses which are connected with the mills. The Boston and Maine Railroad Station is one and a half miles distant. The works comprise two brick mills, with the necessary store-houses, etc., as follows: lower mill, two hundred and twenty-five by thirty-eight feet, three stories and basement; lower addition, ninety by twenty-five feet, two stories and basement.

This mill is operated by a forty-inch Risdon turbine-wheel, under a fall of twenty feet; also a Corliss engine of seventy-five horse-power.

Upper mill, two hundred and seventy-two by forty, three stories and Mansard roof.

Upper addition, seventy by thirty, two stories and basement.

Upper addition, thirty by seventy, three stories and basement.

Upper addition, fifty-eight by thirty, two stories and basement.

Upper addition, fifty-eight by forty, three stories.

Upper addition, one hundred and forty-five by forty, three stories.

Operated by two turbines, viz.:

One forty-three-inch Risdon, fall twelve feet.

One forty-two-inch Houston, fall twelve feet.

Also a Harris-Corliss engine of ninety horse-power.

Two brick store-houses, each one hundred and twenty-six by forty, four stories.

One brick store-house, one hundred by thirty, two stories.

Counting-room building, fifty-seven by forty, two stories.

Dry-house, repair-shop, coal-house, stable, agent's house, and fifty tenements, all substantially built, with slated or gravelled roofs.

The mills are equipped with machinery of the latest and most approved patterns, are lighted with gas, have a complete fire apparatus, including automatic sprinklers and such other conveniences as pertain to a first-class concern.

The business was commenced by Alfred I. Sawyer, who came to Dover from Marlborough, Mass., in 1824.

The Great Falls Manufacturing Company then owned all of the water-powers on the Bellamy Bank River, in Dover, having secured them by purchase made through the agency of Isaac Wendell, in 1823-24. They had also secured land covering the outlet of Chesley's Pond, in Barrington, upon which now is built the reservoir dam.

Alfred I. Sawyer leased of the company the privilege near the bridge, upon which was a grist-mill called the "Libbey Mill." Another building was erected in 1826 in connection with the grist-mill, and on the same fall, in which he carded rols, fulled, and dressed cloth. In 1832 he bought the Hanson Cotton-Factory at Bellamy, moved and erected it on the falls about twenty rods below. In this mill he commenced the manufacture of woolen flannels with one set of machinery. The business prospering, the mill was enlarged, and another set of machinery added in 1837.

In 1845, Mr. Sawyer bought of the Great Falls Manufacturing Company all of their rights in the property, and continued the business without interruption until his death, which occurred in 1849. The business then passed to his brother, Zenas Sawyer, 1849-50; Z. & J. Sawyer, 1850-52; F. A. & J. Sawyer (Francis A. Sawyer, of Boston, and Jonathan Sawyer, of Dover), 1852-73, when Charles H. Sawyer was admitted, and the concern incorporated as the Sawyer Woolen-Mills.

In 1858 the property now known as the lower mill was purchased, with the two sets of machinery which it contained.

The Great Falls Manufacturing Company sold this property in 1845 to C. C. P. Moses, and on the site of the old foundry, which had been operated by William and Daniel Osborne, he built a brick mill, in which he manufactured paper until 1855, when it was changed into a flannel-mill. Since its purchase by F. A. & J. Sawyer, the old machinery has been replaced by new, and the mill gradually enlarged until it now contains sixteen sets. The old mill, before mentioned as started in 1832, was continued in operation until 1872, when it was replaced by the present structure, which contains fourteen sets of machinery, with preparation and finishing machinery for both mills, or thirty sets.

Flannels were made until 1862, when the machinery was gradually changed until 1866. Since then attention has been entirely devoted to the manufacture of fine fancy cassimeres, cloths, and suitings, which have established for themselves a wide reputation.

An exhibit was made at the Centennial Exhibition in Philadelphia in 1876, for which the company was awarded a medal and diploma of merit.

The mills were incorporated in 1873 with a capital of six hundred thousand dollars.

Statistics, 1882.—Sets of cards, 30; Crompton broad fancy looms, 115; spindles, 9280; annual consumption of wool (in the year), 2,400,000 pounds; coal, 2000 tons; value of annual product, $1,200,000; persons employed, 450.

Isaac B. Williams & Sons.—The foundations of the present business of Isaac B. Williams & Sons, of Dover, N. H., was laid by the senior partner in 1842 in the manufacture of belting for the Cochecho Manufacturing Company.

In 1871 the firm-name became I. B. Williams & Son, Frank B. Williams having been taken into the partnership. In 1875 the business had outgrown its quarters in the Cochecho Manufacturing Company's buildings, so that larger and better facilities were needed to supply the increased demand for their goods, and a large and valuable property on Orchard Street was purchased, and so added to and remodeled as to afford the desired facilities.

In 1878, George H. Williams was admitted to the partnership, and the firm-name changed to I. B. Williams & Sons.

In 1882 the firm, by reason of still increased and increasing trade, were compelled to tear down and entirely rebuild their factory, having in the mean time purchased an adjoining property. A large and handsome brick building, four stories high, one hundred and forty feet long by forty-five feet wide, with a tower, containing elevators and stairways, five stories high, now cover their land.

The motive force is furnished by an engine rated at sixty horse-power, connected with a boiler of eighty horse-power.

The factory now contains all the modern machinery required to produce in all respects a perfectly reliable belt, all of which are manufactured from the finest of oak-tanned leather, finished and perfected in their own building under the firm's own immediate supervision and inspection.

Forty-five thousand sides of leather were used in 1881, and with the present building and machinery the firm will be able to produce one million dollars worth of belts per year.

Their goods are sold throughout the United States and South America, and with the facilities now in hand the factory will be one of the largest in the country.

Representatives.—Dover was independent until annexed to Massachusetts, Oct. 9, 1641. At the next General Court, that of May, 1642, Savage says that William Walderne appeared from Dover and sat one day. The General Court held sessions in the spring and autumn of each year. Deputies were chosen, sometimes for one session, sometimes for the year. Our early town records are defective, and Massachusetts records show the names of only those who attended. Residence was not a requisite of eligibility.

Here ended the union with Massachusetts. The commission establishing the province of New Hampshire and appointing John Cutt president of the Council, passed the Great Seal Sept. 18, 1679, and was publicly proclaimed at Portsmouth, Jan. 22, 1679-80. The first General Assembly met March 16, 1679-80.

During the continuance of New Hampshire as a province, deputies were not chosen at stated times, but whenever an Assembly was summoned by writ, which, as well as the dissolution, was at the pleasure of the president and Council. In early years an Assembly continued in existence five years, unless sooner dissolved; later, three years.

We give the dates of meeting and dissolution of the successive Assemblies; not the dates of election in the town. The town records are very poor in reference to deputies, and sometimes the provincial records do not give a list of members of an Assembly. The months of January, February, and March we place in the years of modern usage; that is, January, 1679-80, we call January, 1680.

1680, March 16 to (?).—Peter Coffin, Lieut. Anthony Nutter, Richard Walton, Jr., Speaker.

1683, Jan. 14.—Dissolved the next day; John Gerrish, John Woodman, Lieut. Anthony Nutter.

1684, May — to May —.—No record of names.

1684, July 22.—Very brief; no record of names.

No Assembly was called during the administration of Andros. Upon his overthrow the several towns appointed delegates to a convention to consult upon a method of government.

In Dover:

1690, Jan. 1.—Capt. John Woodman, Capt. John Gerrish, Lieut. John Tuttle, Thomas Edgerly, Lieut. John Roberts, Nicholas Follet.

No result being reached by this convention, a large number of citizens of New Hampshire petitioned, Feb. 20, 1690, that the town be received by Massachusetts, which that government agreed to. Deputies therefore could again be sent to its General Court, but it does not appear that Dover sent any.

Samuel Allen was appointed Governor of New Hampshire March 1, 1692, and assumed the duties of office August 15th following. Separate Assemblies were again called, and were summoned by writ of the royal Governor up to the time of the Revolution.

1692, Oct. 4 to 1693, Aug. 5.—John Woodman, Job Clements, William Furber.

1693, Oct. 18 to 1694, May 24.—William Furber, John Woodman, Job Clements. Clements refused to take the prescribed oaths, and Lieut. John Tuttle was returned, who took the oath March 6, 1694.

CHAPTER CXXII.

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY.

The First Church.—This church is Congregational. The settlement of Dover commenced in the spring of 1623, when Edward Hilton landed upon Dover Neck and built upon the extremity of Hilton's Point. There was no ministry, because of the fewness of the inhabitants, until 1633, when an accession was made to the settlement by a company of about thirty persons from the west of England, who landed at Salem, Mass., Oct. 10, 1633, and immediately came to Dover.

In this company was Rev. William Leverich, "an able and worthy Puritan minister." He intended to remain here, but after a trial of nearly two years, his support proved inadequate and he left the town. He went to Boston, was admitted a member of the First Church there, May 9, 1635, was settled at Sandwich from 1638 or 1639 to 1652, was employed as a missionary in 1653, and probably till 1657; in 1658 removed to Huntington, L. I., whence he went in 1670 to Newton, where he died in 1677, aged seventy-seven. During his ministry the first meeting-house was erected.

George Burdett was second minister. He had left Yarmouth, England, in 1634, came to America, and was admitted to the church in Salem, Mass., where he preached a year or more. In 1637 he came to Dover, where he became preacher, and soon after Governor, displacing Capt. Thomas Wiggin. A man of plausible address and good scholarship, he was generally popular until his correspondence with Archbishop Laud and some instances of immoral conduct were discovered, when he hastily removed to Argentines, Me., in 1638. A similar course there ended in his returning to England, where, entering the royalist army in the civil war, he was taken prisoner by the Parliament troops and committed to prison. Nothing further is known of him.

Hanserd Knollys, third minister, born in Calkwell, Lincolnshire, England, in 1598, a graduate of Cambridge, England, ordained by the bishop of Peterborough, June 30, 1629, held the living of Humberstone, Lincolnshire, but resigned it from conscientious scruples, arrived at Boston, Mass., July, 1638, and at Dover in August. He was forbidden to preach by Mr. Burdett, but after that person's departure he exercised ministerial functions. Under his care the First Church was organized in December, 1638, it being the oldest but one of the churches in New Hampshire. When Mr. Larkham came in 1640 difficulties arose between them, and the people became divided. Mr. Knollys left in 1641, and reached England Dec. 24, 1641. He was there a man of eminent piety and zeal, and a decided Baptist. He suffered greatly from persecution, and died Sept. 2, 1691. His reputation has been aspersed, but, as it now appears, evidently from prejudice. He published twelve works, the most interesting of which is his autobiography.

Thomas Larkham, fourth minister, born at Lyme, Dorsetshire, England, May 4, 1601; graduated at Cambridge, and settled at Northam, near Barnstaple, England; coming to Dover in 1640, he was received as minister in place of Mr. Knollys, but remained only until 1642. In that year he returned to England and settled in Tavistock, Devonshire, where he was, says Calamey, "a man of great piety and sincerity." Ejected by the Uniformity Act of 1662, he lived in great persecution from the Established Church, and died in 1669 in the house of his son-in-law, where he was concealed for fear of imprisonment.

He published three works, the chief of which was a quarto of five hundred and twenty pages on the "Attributes of God."

Daniel Maud, fifth minister, born about 1585, "a man of quiet and peaceable disposition," had been a minister in England, arrived at Boston in 1635, was admitted freeman May 25, 1636, and officiated as schoolmaster for some years. He came to Dover in 1642, being recommended by the ministers in answer to the request of the people of Dover. He died in 1655, his will being dated 17th 11th mo., 1654 (Feb. 17, 1655), and proved June 26, 1655. The second meeting-house was built in 1653, in accordance with a town vote dated 5th 10th mo., 1652; it stood upon the site of the former; a bell was placed upon it in 1665, and a fortification built round it in 1667, the remains of which are still visible.

John Reyner, sixth minister, came to America in or near 1635, settled in Plymouth, Mass., in 1636, left that place in November, 1654, and settled in Dover in 1655. "He was a man of meek and humble spirit, sound in the truth, and every way irrefragable in his life and conversation." During the last few years of his life he was assisted by his son and successor, John Reyner, Jr. He died April 20, 1669, aged sixty-nine. His will was dated April 19th, and proved June 30th, his widow Frances being executrix. He owned and bequeathed an estate in the parish of Batly, Yorkshire, England.

In his time extra services were held at Cochecho on the Sabbath in the winter for several years, William Wentworth, an elder of the church, being employed by the town to preach there.

John Reyner, Jr., seventh minister, son of John Reyner, his predecessor, was born, probably, in Plymouth in 1643; graduated at Harvard College in 1663, and became assistant to his father about 1667. Upon his father's death he was invited, July 22, 1669, to become pastor, and continued to officiate, but was not regularly settled until July 12, 1671. He died at Braintree, Mass., Dec. 21, 1676, "of a cold and fever," says Hull. "that he took in the field among the soldiers." His wife was Judith, daughter of Edmund Quiney, of Braintree. Of him it is said, "he possessed a double portion of his father's spirit."

John Pike, eighth minister, was born in Salisbury, Mass., May 15, 1645; graduated at Harvard College in 1675, came to Dover "for the work of the ministry," Nov. 1, 1678, and was settled Aug. 31, 1681. He was absent some of the time during his settlement here on account of the Indian wars, but he died here in the pastorate, March 10, 1709-10. His wife, Sarah, daughter of Rev. Joshua Moody, died Jan. 24, 1702-3. His will was dated March 6, 1709-10. "He was esteemed as an extraordinary preacher, and a man of true godliness."

Nicholas Sever, ninth minister, was born in Roxbury, Mass., April 15, 1680; graduated at Harvard College in 1701, and was ordained at Dover, April 11, 1711. He resigned his charge in the spring of 1715, on account of an almost total loss of voice. In 1716 he was appointed tutor in Harvard College, where he remained for twelve years. Not long after he was appointed judge of Court of Common Pleas in Plymouth County, Mass., a station for which he proved himself eminently qualified. He died April 7, 1764.

Prior to his settlement the regular meetings of the Sabbath had been held at Dover Neck, but Mr. Sever preached partly at Cochecho. The third meeting-house was erected on Pine Hill, about 1713, but the old one at the Neck stood until about 1720.

Jonathan Cushing, tenth minister, was born in Hingham, Mass., Dec. 20, 1690; graduated at Harvard College in 1712, and was ordained pastor of this church Sept. 18, 1717; during most of his ministry he preached at Cochecho; he died March 25, 1769, having had a colleague for the two years previous. He "sustained the character of a grave and sound preacher, a kind, peaceable, prudent, and judicious pastor, a wise and faithful friend." During his ministry one hundred and thirty-three were added to the church, of whom nine were by letter.

The fourth meeting-house was dedicated Dec. 13, 1758, and stood upon the site of the present house; the former one was sold in pursuance of a vote passed Nov. 26, 1759. The parish was incorporated distinct from the town June 11, 1762.

Jeremy Belknap, D.D., eleventh minister, was born in Boston, Mass., June 4, 1744; graduated at Harvard College in 1762; was ordained colleague with Mr. Cushing, Feb. 18, 1767, and became sole pastor in 1769. He married Ruth Eliot, June 15, 1767. His connection ceased Sept. 11, 1786, and he was installed pastor of the Federal Street Church in Boston (afterwards Dr. Channing's) April 4, 1787; he died of a paralytic attack June 20, 1798. In his ministry here forty-three were added to the church, of whom five were by letter.

Dr. Belknap was distinguished for his literary attainments and beloved for his personal character. He was an ardent patriot in the Revolution, and by his writings and correspondence did eminent service. He published numerous works, the best known of which is his "History of New Hampshire."

Robert Gray, twelfth minister, was born in Andover, Mass., Oct. 9, 1761, graduated at Harvard College in 1786, and was ordained over this church Feb. 28, 1787. He married, March 27, 1787, Lydia Tufts, of Charlestown, Mass. His connection as pastor ceased May 20, 1805. He preached afterwards in the western part of Barrington, though he was never again settled, and died in Wolfborough, N. H., Aug. 25, 1822. During his ministry thirty-four were added to the church.

Caleb Hamilton Shearman, thirteenth minister, was born in Brimfield, Mass., in 1779; graduated at Brown University in 1803; was ordained at Dover May 6, 1807, and dismissed May 7, 1812. He left Dover about 1815, went to Charleston, S. C., and afterwards to New York State, where he died. Six persons are recorded as having united with the church during his ministry.

Joseph Ward Clary, fourteenth minister, was born in Rowe, Mass., Nov. 21, 1786; graduated at Middlebury College in 1808, received his theological education at Andover, and was ordained pastor of this church May 7, 1812. He was dismissed, by mutual council, Aug. 6, 1828, and on the 29th of November was installed pastor at Cornish, N. H.; he resigned his pastoral charge in 1834, and died April 13, 1835, "a good and pious man, a serious and faithful pastor." Mr. Clary was reinterred Dec. 19, 1855, in Pine Hill burying-ground, by desire of this church. During his ministry sixty-nine united with the church.

Hubbard Winslow, D.D., LL.D., fifteenth minister, was born in Williston, Vt., Oct. 30, 1799; graduated at Yale College in 1825, received his theological education at New Haven and Andover, and was ordained pastor Dec. 4, 1828. In the midst of a promising revival his health failed and he was obliged to leave the place; he was dismissed by council Nov. 30, 1831. During his ministry and previous to the settlement of his successor, one hundred and eighty were added to this church, of whom thirty-one were by letter. Mr. Winslow was installed pastor of the Bowdoin Street Church in Boston Sept. 26, 1832, and dismissed in March, 1844. He was in active service many years, especially in charge of seminaries for the liberal education of young ladies. He published various works, mainly educational. He died at Williston, Vt., Aug. 13, 1864, aged sixty-five.

David Root, sixteenth minister, was born in Piermont, N. H., June 17, 1791; graduated at Middlebury College in 1816; received his theological education principally under the direction of Dr. N. S. S. Beman, late of Troy, N. Y.; labored as a missionary some time in Georgia; was ordained pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church in Cincinnati, Ohio, Sept. 4, 1819; resigned his charge in 1832, and was installed pastor of this church Feb. 6, 1833; his connection ceased Sept. 4, 1839. During his ministry here one hundred and sixty-six were added to the church, of whom thirty-nine were by letter. Mr. Root settled in Waterbury, Conn., in 1840, and afterwards at Guilford. He died in Chicago, Ill., Aug. 30, 1873, aged eighty-three.

Jeremiah Smith Young, seventeenth minister, was born in Whitestown, N. Y., Sept. 10, 1809; received his theological education at Andover, where he graduated in 1839; was ordained here Nov. 20, 1839; his connection was dissolved September, 1843, in consequence of ill health, and he never afterwards settled. During his ministry one hundred and eighty united with the church, of whom thirty-four were by letter. He died in Somerville, Mass., April 26, 1861, aged fifty-two.

Homor Barrows, eighteenth minister, was born in Wareham, Mass., Dec. 19, 1806; graduated at Amherst College in 1831, and at Andover Theological Seminary in 1831; was ordained pastor of the Second Church in Middleboro', Mass., June 1, 1836; left that place in 1842; was stated supply at Norton, Mass., for three years, and was installed pastor of this church July 9, 1845. His connection was terminated by a mutual council held July 6, 1852. During his pastorate fifty-eight were added to the church, of whom twenty-seven were by letter. Mr. Barrows was installed pastor of the church in Wareham, Mass., Oct. 27, 1852, and was afterwards, from 1859 to 1869, acting pastor at Plaistow, N. H. He now resides at Andover, Mass.

Benjamin Franklin Parsons, nineteenth minister, was born in Wiscasset, June 22, 1820; graduated at Bowdoin College in 1841; received his theological education at New York and Bangor, graduating at Bangor Theological Seminary in 1846. He was ordained as the first minister of the Congregational Church at Watertown, Wis., Jan. 25, 1847; installed as first pastor of the First Church at Waukegan, Ill., Nov. 1, 1848; resigned his charge in October, 1852, and was installed pastor of this church Jan. 12, 1853. He was dismissed Sept. 3, 1856, and at once became pastor of the Belknap Church in this city, from which he was dismissed Oct. 24, 1861. He is still in ministerial service, and from November, 1874, has been acting pastor of the church in Woonsocket, R. I.; his home is in Derry, N. H. During his ministry here forty-one were added to the church.

Elias Huntington Richardson, twentieth minister, was born in Lebanon, N. H., Aug. 11, 1827; graduated at Dartmouth College in 1850, and at Andover in 1853; was ordained pastor of the church in Goffstown, N. H., May 18, 1854; dismissed Oct. 30, 1856. He was installed over this church Dec. 10, 1856, and dismissed Dec. 10, 1863. He was settled in Providence, R. I., Dec. 30, 1863, afterwards in Westfield, Mass., and in 1872 became pastor of the First Church in Hartford, Conn., where he still remains. During his ministry ninety were added to the church, and thirty by him after he was dismissed.

Avery Skinner Walker, twenty-first minister, was born in Union Square, Osage Co., N. Y., Oct. 15, 1829; graduated at Oberlin College in 1854, and at Union Theological Seminary in 1857. H., Sept. 1, 1869.

Rev. Dr. Belknap says that "mention is made of persons with the title of elders from 1647 to 1662, and it appears that there were three elders, viz.: Nutter, Wentworth, and Starbuck." (They were called elders as early as 1638, and probably were chosen when the church was organized.)

Elders: Hatevil Nutter, died 1675; Edward Starbuck, left Dover 1659, and went to Nantucket; died Dec. 4, 1690, aged eighty-six; William Wentworth, died March 16, 1697, aged eighty-one.

The first meeting-house was erected in 1634 or earlier, and stood near the Beck Cove, on the western slope of the Neck. The second was built on the spot where the remnant of the fortifications once around it still remains. In 1653 it was to be "forty foote longe, twenty-six foote wide, sixteen foot studd, with six windows, two doores fitt for such a house, with a tile covering, and to plank all the walls, with glass and nails for it."

The order for the fortification was:

"4, 5 no., 1667. It is Agried with Capt. Coffin to Build the forte about the meeting house on dover neck, on [one] hundred foot square with two Scones of sixteen foot squre and all the timber to [be] twelfe Inches thicke and the Wall to be Eight foot hize [high] with sells and Braces, and the sellectmenc with the melletroye officers have agreed to pay him an hundred pounds in day workes at 2s 6d p day and alsoe to all persons Concerned in the workes on day to help to Rayse the work at so many on day as he shall appoint."

The earthwork in which this timber was set is still well preserved.

This house was standing in a ruinous state in 1720. The second meeting-house was probably built little after the year 1700, for Mr. Sever, who was settled in 1711, and dismissed in 1715, preached in both houses. This house was sold in pursuance of a vote of the town, passed Nov. 26, 1759, and was taken down in 1760. It stood on Pine Hill, on land now inclosed in the burying-ground, very near its northern boundary, and a little west of north of the tomb of the Cushing family. The third meeting-house was erected in 1758, and dedicated Dec. 13, 1758, and stood where the present house stands. Feb. 16, 1829, the parish voted to sell the old meeting-house. The northern end was taken off and converted by the purchaser into a dwelling-house, and now stands on the east side of Court Street, near the brook. The remainder of the house was taken down in April. The fourth and present meeting-house was erected in 1829, dedicated Dec. 30, 1829, and cost about twelve thousand dollars. The parish was incorporated as a parish district from the town by an act of the Provincial Assembly, passed June 11th.

Society of Friends.—The first mention we find of any Quakers in Dover, in any history, is that in 1662 three traveling sisters were whipped out of town by order of Maj. Walderne (a copy of Maj. Walderne's order may be found in the collections of the New Hampshire Historical Society, vol. ii, p. 45). Dr. Belknap remarks in his "History of New Hampshire" that the Friends once comprised a third part of the population of the town. Their numbers now are quite respectable. The first "meeting" of Friends in this town was established at Dover Neck as early as 1680, where their first meeting-house was built prior to the year 1700. It stood about half a mile north of the one built by the First Parish two hundred years ago, and was taken down about the year 1770. (The frame and principal materials of this house were taken across the river, and rebuilt for a Friends' Society in Kittery, now Eliot, where it now stands.) And the one now occupied by the society in this village was erected about the same time. Previous to this, however, they had a small house on Silver Street, which was built prior to 1720, for it appears by their records that in December of that year they "agreed to repair their house at Cochecho."

This house stood where the residence of Jacob K. Purinton now stands. At that time they held meetings at Dover Neck as well as Cochecho. The first "Monthly Meeting" was set up in 1702, and their records extend back to that time. The first "Quarterly Meeting" was established in 1708.

Methodist Episcopal Church.—In 1819 the first Methodist meetings for worship were held at a small village which then existed some two miles up the river from the present city proper, called the Upper Factory, where was a small manufacturing establishment.

Rev. John Lord, since a prominent minister in Maine, now deceased, seems to have visited this locality and preached to the people, organizing a class, and subsequently a Sunday-school. "Reformation" John Adams also visited and labored among them, as did Mr. C. G. Chase, a local preacher of excellent reputation, who was for many years after an influential and useful man in this church. Thomas Greenhalgh, a calico-printer, employed at his art in the very beginning of what is now the Cochecho Print-Works, and an English local preacher, also labored with them. The late Solomon Gray and the late George W. Wendell, of Great Falls, both resided at the Upper Factory at this time, and were pioneers in Methodism in Dover. Father Gray was a class-leader, and probably the first in that office in this church.

Dover was erected into a distinct charge in 1823. Rev. Jotham Horton was appointed as the preacher; admitted to the Conference in 1820. He preached alternately at the Upper Factory and in the old court-house at the village.

Measures were taken in 1824—Mr. Horton's second year—for the erection of a house of worship. A lot of land (that on which the present house stands) was procured of the heirs of the celebrated Maj. Richard Walderne, whose grave is in the immediate vicinity. It was donated on condition that it should be used only and always for the sacred purpose to which it was devoted. The committee appointed to conduct the enterprise conveyed the lot and buildings in due form and time by deed to the trustees of the society as a legal corporation.

The church was not quite completed when Mr. Horton's term of service expired. Rev. John N. Maffitt was appointed his successor. His ministry, owing to his remarkable and peculiar eloquence, secured much attention. The church was finished and dedicated by Rev. Ephraim Wiley, of Boston, April 28, 1825. Mr. Maffitt remained in the pastorate two Conference years. During his ministry in 1827, January 28th, a regular "legal society" or parish organization was formed, according to the usage of those days. The trustees were appointed by this society for many years. They were nominated by the pastor, and so far were in accordance with the discipline of the church. The first board of trustees were Joseph Smith, Lewis B. Tibbetts, Barnabas H. Palmer, Richard Walker, George Piper, George W. Edgerly, and Theodore Littlefield. Rev. Benjamin R. Hoyt, the presiding elder, acted as moderator at the meeting at which the legal society was formed.

Rev. B. R. Hoyt was appointed to "Dover and Somersworth," but confined his attention to Dover, and labored with great acceptance and success two years.

The parsonage-house was built during Mr. Hoyt's administration. It was commenced in 1828, and finished the next year. The first notice we find of the "vestry," in any document, is that a meeting of the "society" for business was held in it May 1, 1827.

In 1827 two hundred members are reported, and in 1828 only sixty-one, evidently some mistake. In 1829, when Mr. Hoyt's labors closed, the number is reported as one hundred and twenty-five.

Rev. John F. Adams was appointed presiding elder as the successor of Rev. B. R. Hoyt, when the latter came to the Dover charge in 1827. He served four years.

In 1829, Rev. Bartholomew Otheman came to Dover as the successor of Mr. Hoyt. The number in church when Mr. Otheman left, in 1830, was two hundred and twelve.

The Quarterly Conference records—the earliest of which in our possession is of the date of Dec. 22, 1828, with J. F. Adams as presiding elder and B. R. Hoyt preacher in charge—give no account of ministers' claims as estimated or paid, or other general expenses of the church. The first note of preacher's salary, then called "claim" or "estimate," I find is in 1841, when the whole amount was four hundred and fifty-six dollars.

Rev. John G. Dow was stationed at Dover, as the successor of Mr. Otheman, and served two years. The church was enlarged by the addition of sixteen and a half feet to the rear end. The vestry was also enlarged and the whole inclosure fenced. Arrangements were made for liquidating the debt still remaining on the parsonage. One hundred and twenty-five persons are recorded as admitted to the church within the two years of Mr. Dow's labors. He baptized ninety-six persons. Membership in 1832, two hundred and seventy-four.

Rev. R. H. Deming came in 1832, and remained one year. Some additions were made to the church under his labors, but the records are very scanty. He left a membership of three hundred and thirty-six. He was followed by Rev. Homes Cushman. He left the charge before the close of the year. Number of members reported at the end of this year, two hundred and twenty-five. Rev. Jared Perkins was the next pastor. It was during this time that the great agitation of the public mind on the slavery question began to cause considerable trouble and disturbance in the Methodist Episcopal Church. Mr. Perkins sympathized strongly with the growing anti-slavery sentiment of the time, and readily admitted to his church and pulpit Rev. George Storrs, who came to lecture on the sin of slavery, the "vildest that ever saw the sun." It was on such an occasion that an attempt was made to mob Mr. Storrs, when Mr. Perkins and Rev. Mr. Root, pastor of the Congregational Church, with other friends, led the lecturer between them safely through the raging rabble to the pastor's house. Mr. Perkins began his labors in 1833, and closed his two years in 1835. The membership in 1835 is reported as two hundred and twenty-five. Rev. Eleazer Smith was appointed to the charge as Mr. Perkins' successor in 1835, but by a peculiar arrangement the latter was permitted to remain in Dover a third year, and Mr. Smith served at Great Falls, to which charge Mr. Perkins had been appointed.

Rev. E. Smith became pastor in fact after Mr. Perkins, as he had been in name for the year before. This was in 1837. Rev. Silas Greene was appointed as his successor in 1838. He labored two years with great acceptance. He returned a membership of three hundred and fourteen in 1839.

Rev. J. G. Dow was the presiding elder from the Conference of 1832 to that of 1836, and Schuyler Chamberlain succeeded him in 1837, and served till 1840.

At the Conference of 1840 Rev. E. Scott was appointed pastor. Through his efforts a fine bell was placed in the church tower, and many other improvements were effected.

The New Hampshire Conference held its annual session in Dover in 1841. The bishop presiding was Rev. Joshua Soule, D.D.

Rev. Elijah Mason was appointed pastor next after Mr. Scott, in 1842. He remained two years, and was generally respected as an able and devoted minister, but these were troublous times in the country and in the church. The anti-slavery agitation and the excitement attendant upon the preaching of William Miller, and the predictions of the coming of Christ and the end of the world in 1843 were more or less sources of controversy and party feeling in the Dover Church.

Besides, unfortunately, just at this time there arose "no small stir" among the people on the question of instrumental music in the church. This last matter resulted in a very bitter controversy, and was undoubtedly the real cause, if not the occasion, of the extensive secession which took place during Mr. Mason's second year, 1843. That the question of slavery in the church, and the policy of the church on that matter, as well as the "Second Advent" excitement, contributed their share in disaffection and alienation may be very true, yet it is evident that no division would have resulted but for the agitation on that fruitful source of difficulty, church music. As it was, some sixty members withdrew from the church. This secession finally organized into a "True Wesleyan" Church, and built a small chapel on Charles Street (now the Charles Street Free-Will Baptist Church), where they flourished for a while. Like similar movements elsewhere, however, it soon came to naught. Some few of those good people came back to the old church, some scattered among other denominations.

Rev. Jacob Stevens succeeded Mr. Mason in 1844, and labored two years. March 15, 1845, there were two hundred scholars in the Sunday-school.

Rev. Samuel Kelley came to this charge as the successor of Mr. Stevens in 1846. Mr. Kelley's two years were prosperous. The church was repaired at a cost of about $900.

Rev. Charles N. Smith followed Mr. Kelley as pastor in 1848, and continued two years. Membership, 173 in full; 41 probationers.

Rev. Justin Spaulding followed Mr. Smith in 1850, and served two years. Number of members in 1851, 189; probationers, 10; Sunday-school scholars, 228; raised for missions, $51. At the close of his second year, in 1852, members, 160, a loss of 29, probably by a needed revision of the records; probationers, 19; Sunday-school scholars, 230; raised for missions, $105; salary, $500.

Rev. J. C. Cromack came to the charge in 1852. He served two years. He had some revival, and left the church in good condition. His salary was $550, the largest ever paid up to this time. He reports at the close of his ministry in 1854, members, 212; probationers, 38; Sunday-school scholars, 240; raised for missions, $185.

Rev. Lewis Howard was Mr. Cromack's successor, coming in 1854. He served two years. He reports at the close of his second year, members, 220; probationers, 6; Sunday-school scholars, 230; missionary money, $50.

Rev. F. A. Hewes was Mr. Howard's successor. He died in 1860 at South Newmarket, and was buried in our cemetery at Pine Hill. He reported at the close of his service, members, 225; probationers, 8; total, 233; raised for missions, $71; number of Sunday-school scholars, 233. The church was frescoed and some other repairs effected during Mr. Hewes' service.

Rev. Calvin Holman came to the pastorate in 1858. He served one year, and was then appointed presiding elder of Dover District. The salary was advanced to $700 this year. Members in 1859, 252; probationers, 47; total, 299, a gain of 66 during the year; Sunday-school scholars, 375, a larger number than at any previous time; missionary money, $73.10.

Rev. James M. Buckley came in May, 1859. He reported at the conclusion of his two years, members, 293; probationers, 50; total, 343, a gain of 44 in two years.

Rev. Dudley P. Leavitt came in 1861, and served two years. At the close of his first year a total membership of 297, 19 of them being probationers. Number of scholars in Sunday-school, 310; raised for missions, $115.

Mr. Leavitt was followed by Rev. Linville J. Hall, who served two years. During his terms the old vestry was abandoned, and a new and commodious chapel erected on the eastern side of the church, at a cost of more than $2000. It contained a principal room, seating some 200 persons, used for general prayer-meetings, and two fine class-rooms.

The parsonage also was removed to the site of the old vestry, and brought to face St. John Street. An addition was built on the rear, and the whole building greatly improved in capacity and convenience. He reports at the close of his labors in 1865, 299 members and 26 probationers; total, 325. Sunday-school scholars, 241, and $90 raised for missions.

In April, 1865, the New Hampshire Annual Conference held its session in the Dover Church, Bishop Ames presiding.

Rev. O. H. Jasper was appointed to the charge from this Conference. He served two years, commanding the respect and confidence of the church and the community by his ability as a preacher and his faithful pastoral administration. The indebtedness of the society for the removal of the parsonage and the building of the new chapel was liquidated. It being the occasion of the celebration of the centenary (A. D. 1867) of American Methodism, the people appropriated their contributions in this direction. Mr. Jasper reports at the close of his labors, members, 250; probationers, 22; total, 272. Another sitting of the membership had evidently taken place. The Sunday-school numbered 280. The largest sum was raised for missions of any year up to this time, $300. Mr. Jasper left the church in a healthy condition.

Rev. James Pike was appointed presiding elder, as Mr. Manson's successor, in 1867. He served four years from that date.

Rev. R. S. Stubbs came as Mr. Jasper's successor in 1867. He had two good years. An extensive revival was enjoyed during his labors, which added considerable strength to the church. He reports at the close of his second year, in 1869, 259 members and 70 probationers.

Mr. Stubbs was naturally desirous of remaining a third year in our pastorate, but this arrangement did not meet the approval of the "official board," that body having taken the ground that the old rule of two years should still be the maximum limit of pastoral service in the Dover Church. Mr. Stubbs was removed ostensibly on this ground, and naturally there was considerable discontent among some of the people, but no serious injury resulted.

Rev. James Thurston was appointed as the successor of Mr. Stubbs in 1869. He remained two years. He was received with unexpected cordiality, and sustained by a strong official board and a generous people. He hopes his ministry, so pleasant to himself and family, was not without its good fruits to the church and people. He found a large list of probationers left by his predecessor,—70 in number,—but was not able with his best efforts to find many of them, or to lead a large number of those he did find to full Christian life and church-membership. Mr. Thurston's health was very poor during a part of his term of service, and failed entirely just at the close of his second year. He reports at the Conference of 1870, members, 310; probationers, 8; Sunday-school scholars, 263; collected for all benevolent purposes, $600, $500 being for missions. This was the largest sum ever yet raised for church benevolences. The salary was $1300, the same as it had been for some three or four years previous.

Rev. O. H. Jasper, D. D., was appointed presiding elder at the expiration of Mr. Pike's term in 1871. He served four years, having his residence in Dover.

In 1871, Rev. M. C. Brittain, who had been transferred from the Baltimore Conference, was stationed at Dover. Owing to habits of intemperance, which he said he had formed in the navy, in which he had served as a chaplain, he resigned the charge at the request of the official board and the presiding elder in December. He removed from the city soon after his resignation. The church was deeply affected with grief at this unfortunate event, but treated Mr. Brittain with the greatest kindness, and bore with him some time with charitable hopes of his reformation, which was of no avail, notwithstanding his strong promises and feeble efforts.

By request of the Quarterly Conference, and with the general concurrence of the church and congregation, the presiding elder appointed Rev. James Thurston, who is still residing in this city, as a supernumerary minister, to assume the pastoral charge of the church. Taking charge in January, he acted as pastor the rest of the Conference year, preaching occasionally as he was able, but supplying the pulpit by help from abroad most of the time. This sad episode in our history resulted in less harm to the society than was feared, though a source of some discouragement and a slight loss.

In 1872, Rev. C. W. Millen was appointed pastor, and reappointed in 1873. A new house for the society's use on the Hedding camp-ground was erected at a cost of $400. Mr. Millen reports at the Conference of 1844, members, 290; probationers, 19; total, 309. Sunday-school scholars, 302. Mr. Millen's salary was $1500.

Rev. Wilber F. Crafts came in 1874. Numbers in church in 1875, 265; probationers, 80; total, 345; a gain of 55. Sunday-school scholars, 353. Raised for missions, $218, $41 of which was by the Women's Foreign Mission Society.

The juvenile department of the Sunday-school was organized as a separate, though not independent branch, under the direction and care of Mrs. Crafts.

Rev. O. W. Scott came to the charge after Mr. Crafts, in 1875.

It was decided early in the first year of Mr. Scott's labors to build a new church. This enterprise was commenced in August, 1875, and the elegant structure which now stands on the site of the old edifice was completed and dedicated to God by Bishop Foster, Sept. 6, 1876.

The old church, which had served its purpose for fifty years, though unsuitable for the uses of the society on account of limited capacity and ill adaptation in style and convenience, was yet dear to the older members of the church, and given up with natural reluctance.

The last service in it was held on Sunday, Aug. 1, 1875. The service of the laying of the corner-stone was observed on the 2d of October, 1875, under the direction of Rev. Dr. Barrows, presiding elder of Dover District, who gave an address and laid the stone. The prayer for this service in the ritual was offered by Rev. J. Thurston. The singing was by the choir of the church, led by John S. Hayes. A large congregation attended, and the service was solemn and impressive. The stone contains documents giving an account of the building and demolition of the old edifice, the names of the present pastor, presiding elder, church officials, building committee, city papers, coins, etc., closely sealed up in a copper box.

The new church was dedicated Sept. 6, 1876. It is built of brick, with basement entirely above ground. It is 56 feet wide and 100 feet long, exclusive of the chancel and tower projections, which make its entire length about 120 feet. Its walls from the ground are 45 feet high, and the tower, which is at one corner, has a height of 140 feet. The tower contains a chime of nine bells, with an aggregate weight of 8600 pounds, costing about $3600. These bells are of excellent tone. This is the only chime of bells in a Methodist Church in the world, except the Metropolitan at Washington. The basement contains a complete set of church rooms. Aside from the entries it has a lecture-room, with seats for about 600 persons; a smaller vestry, with 175 sittings; a library-room, opening into both these apartments, for the accommodation of both the adult and juvenile divisions of the Sunday-school; a completely appointed kitchen, a parlor for the ladies' circle. The organ was built by Hutchins & Plaisted, of Boston, and cost $3000. The church will seat nearly 1000 persons. The entire cost of the building with furniture is $35,700.

Rev. Morris W. Prince was appointed as the successor of Mr. Scott, and remained till 1879. L. C. Field was pastor from 1879 to 1880; C. E. Hall, 1880-81. In the last nine years the superintendents of the Sunday-school have been William A. Morrill, Emulus Thompson, Harrison Haley, James A. Horne, and E. T. Brigham.

The First Universalist Society was organized March 23, 1825, on which occasion Jonathan Locke was chairman, and J. H. Curtis, clerk. Hiram Rollins, N. W. Ela, Joseph Badger, and John Moore were also prominent members. This society was reorganized in 1837, under the name of the First Universalist of Dover. They have a neat house of worship, pleasantly situated in Third Street. It was erected in 1837, and dedicated December 8th same year. It cost two thousand eight hundred dollars. Rev. Rufus O. Williams was their pastor. He was installed May 23, 1838. Resigned his office May, 1841. A fine-toned bell was placed upon the church November, 1842, at a cost of three hundred and seventy-five dollars. It weighs one thousand three hundred and sixty-five pounds. The church was publicly recognized with appropriate services Dec. 25, 1838. Rev. Eben Francis was born in Boston, May 28, 1819. Began his labors in Dover June 6, 1841; ordained pastor Oct. 13, 1841; dismissed 1844.

His successors have been W. G. Anderson, 1845-46; J. G. Forman, 1847-48; Thomas J. Greenwood, 1848-58; F. E. Hicks, 1858-61; Benjamin F. Eaton, 1862-66; E. Hewitt, 1868-70; J. Crehore, 1871-73; H. W. Hand, 1877-78; J. Gorton, 1878-79.

From June, 1879, there has been no public worship. The house was sold in 1874. But the organization has been preserved, and worship will soon be renewed. A new and elegant brick church of fine architecture is being erected on Franklin Street by the munificence of Thomas W. Peirce, a former citizen of Dover, in commemoration of his parents. The building is called the "Peirce Memorial Church," and is an ornament to the city.

The First Free-Will Baptist Church.—Some time in or near the year 1824, individuals, members of Free-Will Baptist Churches in the main village and at "Upper Factory," began to assemble at the latter place for religious worship. In 1826 a revival was enjoyed.

Organized Sept. 15, 1826, with twenty-five members, at the house of Mrs. Webster, at Garrison Hill. Elder Roger Copp was moderator, and Samuel Davis served as clerk. Sept. 2, 1827, the Lord's Supper was administered for the first time by Elder E. Place. Garrison Hill school-house being too small for the assembly, they gathered under some shady oaks near by.

Meetings were held in Garrison Hill school-house, old court-house in opposite direction, in a hall in Sawyer's building on Landing, an unfinished room over the blacksmith-shop on the hill, Main Street, which took the name of "Iron Chapel," at Deacon Jenness' vestry under G. W. Wendell's house, corner of School and Main Streets, at the academy, and in many private dwellings in the village and at Upper Factory.

Oct. 27, 1830, steps were taken to purchase a lot and to erect a meeting-house on (what is now known as) the corner of Chestnut and Lincoln Streets. This was accomplished at a cost of two thousand dollars, and May 20, 1832, it was dedicated; sermon by Rev. A. Caverno. The strength and efficiency of the church was essentially in the women who worked in the factories, who, under God, were the soul of the movement in building a house of worship. In September, 1834, the church numbered two hundred and fifty.

1838-39 was a time of severe trials, resulting in a division and the formation of a new church (now Washington Street). Under the blessing of God, a precious revival followed.

In 1843, under the labors of Elder Hiram Stevens, the church endured a severe shock from the intense excitement of Millerism, in which the pastor for a time was carried away. It soon recovered, by the help of God, from the injury received. From the unfortunate trials of 1872 and 1873, near the close of Rev. E. A. Stockman's pastorate, it has measurably recovered.

Aug. 17, 1851, the society abandoned its house of worship on Chestnut Street for a new one, remodeled at a cost of fifteen hundred dollars, on Charles Street, since which time three thousand dollars or more have been expended in vestry, repairs, and changes. The church has seen many trials, but it has also seen many precious revivals and many souls converted. Sixteen hundred have been members of the church, as near as can be ascertained by the records. Present number, three hundred and nine. Of the original members, only three are now living, viz.: Mrs. Vienna Wendell, William Gray, and Mrs. Dorcas Pray. The latter gave out the first appointment for a Free-Will Baptist meeting in Dover.

Pastors: Andrew T. Foss, in 1827, one year and a half; Mayhew Clark, in 1829, short time; Nathaniel Thurston, in 1831, about three years; Enoch Mack, October, 1835, to May, 1837; A. D. Smith, June, 1837, about two years; Aaron Ayer, in 1839, about two years; Hiram Stevens, in 1842, about two years; S. W. Perkins, in 1844, some over one year; A. D. Smith, in 1846, three years; A. Caverno, in 1849, to April, 1852; Mooers Cole, August, 1852, to May, 1855; A. Caverno, May, 1855, to May, 1856; J. M. Durgin, May, 1856, to April, 1860; James Rand, Oct. 14, 1860, to Sept. 29, 1867; John Malvern, March, 1868, to Sept. 24, 1871; E. A. Stockman, Nov. 15, 1871, to January, 1873; Charles E. Blake, June, 1874, to July, 1875; E. W. Ricker, February, 1876, to March, 1882; H. F. Wood, May, 1882.

Between the pastorates of Stockman and Blake, Brother Louis Malvern supplied six months; also for one year, from 1834 to 1835, Elders A. Sutton, Jonathan Woodman, Clement Finney, and others supplied.

The First Unitarian Society of Christians in

Dover.—The first meeting for forming this society was holden Aug. 28, 1827. The society was organized on the 4th of September following.

The first meeting for public worship was holden at the court-house, November 4th of the same year, when Rev. Henry Ware, Jr., then pastor of the New Brick Church, Hanover Street, Boston, and afterwards Professor of Pulpit Eloquence in Cambridge Divinity School, officiated. The house was built of brick, seventy by eighty-three feet, in the year 1828, situated on Locust Street, opposite head of Kirkland Street, and cost twelve thousand dollars. It was dedicated, and Rev. Samuel Kirkland Lothrop ordained Feb. 17, 1829. The dedicatory services were performed by Rev. Dr. Nichols, of Portland, and ordination sermon by Rev. Dr. Parker, of Portland. The church was gathered the evening previous.

Mr. Lothrop was born in Utica, N. Y., Oct. 13, 1804, was graduated at Harvard College in 1825, received his theological education at the Theological School at Cambridge, and was approbated for the ministry August, 1828. He was pastor of the church and society until May, 1834. He was succeeded by Rev. Edgar Buckingham, who was ordained Dec. 30, 1835. He resigned June 17, 1839, and removed to Trenton, N. Y. Rev. John Parkman, native of Boston, Mass., graduated at Harvard College in 1831, had been settled in the ministry in Greenfield, Mass., and was installed pastor of this church and society April 22, 1840. He remained until 1849. His successors have been:

Henry F. Bond, ordained May, 1851.

Edwin M. Wheelock, ordained Jan. 27, 1857, appointed chaplain, October, 1862, of the Fifteenth New Hampshire Volunteers.

Francis E. Abbot, ordained Aug. 31, 1864.

Charles A. Allen, settled Sept. 5, 1875, resigned March 30, 1879.

W. R. G. Mellen, began labor Oct. 1, 1880.

Franklin Street Baptist Church was constituted with thirteen members, and recognized in the usual form by a council on the 23d day of April, 1828. The names of members were John Alden, Samuel Chase, John Roberts, Dorcas Alden, Charity Woodward, Hannah Wentworth, Louisa A. Ayer, John Gould, Joshua W. Bazin, William E. Lord, Mary E. Harris, Sarah Wentworth, Sarah J. Ayer.

Before organization, in March, 1828, Rev. Duncan Dunbar was invited to preach to this body of Baptist friends, and as a result of a few Sundays' stay three were baptized on profession of their faith.

Oct. 21, 1829, Brother Elijah Foster was ordained. On the same day the present church edifice was dedicated. The Rev. Elijah Foster continued pastor of the church till the spring of 1831, when he received and accepted a call to the pastorate of the First Baptist Church of Salisbury and Amesbury, Mass.

In December, 1832, Rev. Noah Hooper was elected pastor, and remained until July, 1833, when he was dismissed to become pastor of the Baptist Church of Sanbornton, N. H. At the same meeting of the dismissal of Rev. Mr. Hooper it was also voted to call Rev. Gibbon Williams to the pastorate. He remained with the church until the summer of 1835, when he accepted the call of the church at Chester.

In November, 1835, Brother Benjamin Brierly was ordained to the work of the ministry and settled as pastor of the church. His stay was nearly two years.

In June, 1838, Brother Lucien Hayden, of Hamilton Theological Seminary, was ordained to the work of the gospel ministry, and remained three years.

The successor of Rev. Mr. Hayden was Rev. A. M. Swain, who came to the pastorate of the church in November, 1842, and remained until May, 1844.

In September, 1844, Rev. Oliver Ayer became pastor of the church. He officiated six years and eight months.

Rev. L. D. Hill followed as pastor, coming to the work June 1, 1851, and remaining a little more than two years.

Rev. John Cookson succeeded him March 16, 1854. During his pastorate of one year alterations and improvements in the house of worship to the amount of $550 were made.

Brother Warren B. Clapp, a licentiate of the Franklindale Church, New York, accepted a call from the church, and was ordained as its pastor May 27, 1856. He remained six years.

In August, 1862, Rev. L. D. Hill was again called to the pastorate of this church from Thomaston, Me., and officiated four years.

Deacon John Gould, for thirty-five years an office-bearer in the church, and one of its first deacons, a man greatly loved, died.

In May, 1867, Rev. Alden Sherwin, of Brattleboro', Vt., accepted a unanimous call to the pastorate of the church, remaining until October, 1868.

In September, 1869, Rev. William T. Chase commenced pastoral labors with the church. After four years and two months he was dismissed to the pastorate of the Baptist Church at Lewiston, Me.

In February, 1874, Rev. A. Bryant was chosen to the pastorate, whose stay extended over a period of a year and two months.

On the 30th of September, 1875, Brother Charles A. Towne was ordained to the work of the ministry, and was settled as pastor of the church. He was dismissed May, 1881.

Rev. Robert L. Colwell became pastor in October, 1881.

During the first fifty years of its existence there have been added to the church 662 members, 411 of whom were baptized into its fellowship, and the remainder by letter and experience. Six of the fourteen pastors of the church are still living and in active service.

The year following the organization of the church the Sunday-school work was taken up, and has been engaged in ever since that time.

Roman Catholic Church.—Mass was first said in this town in the winter of 1826, by Rev. Virgil H. Barber, S.J. Among the prominent pioneer Catholics in Dover were William Ashcroft, John Burns, Francis G. O'Neill, Philip F. Scanlan, and William McDevitt.

Services were first held in the court-house. May 17, 1828, the corner-stone of the first Catholic Church was laid, and was completed and accepted in June, 1829. It cost $2800. The church was consecrated Sept. 26, 1830, by Rt. Rev. Dr. Dominick Fenwick, of Boston. The rapid growth of the church demanded a more commodious church edifice, and in 1872 the present building was completed.

The first regular pastor of the church was Rev. Father French, in 1827, who remained two years after the erection of the first church edifice, and was succeeded by Rev. Father Lee, M.D., D.D. He remained three years, and was followed by Rev. Father McNamee, M.D., D.D. He officiated until 1839, and was succeeded by Rev. Father Conovan, who stayed until 1855. Father McShane came next, succeeded by Father Brady. Next came Father Niccolo, who was followed by Father Drummond, assisted by the Rev. Father Blodgett, a convert, who was given full charge of the parish before he had been here a year on account of the feebleness of Father Drummond.

Father Blodgett was one of the most able and enterprising priests that ever presided over this parish. It was through him that the New Hampshire House property and the new Catholic cemetery was secured, and, had he lived, he would have erected upon this property one of the finest churches in the State. Father Blodgett died May 15, 1881, and was the first priest to be buried in Dover. Rev. Father Murphy succeeded, and was soon given full charge of the parish, as Father Drummond became demented, and died in October of the present year.

Father Murphy has improved the New Hampshire House property by erecting on it one of the finest parochial schools in the county; he has also remodeled the main building of the hotel for a nunnery. The present church is to be improved at once, at an expense of thousands of dollars. New steam-heating apparatus is to be put in, also a set of chime bells, and the church is to be frescoed by one of the best artists in that business. The parsonage has been all remodeled and extended under the supervision of Father Murphy.

St. Thomas' Church.—The first account of services in the vicinity of Dover in accordance with the doctrine and ritual of the Protestant Episcopal Church of America is to be found in the report of Rev. Henry Blackaller to a convention held at Hopkinton, Wellneslay, Sept. 8, 1830. Therein he reports a flourishing parish by the name of St. Paul's Church, Great Falls, Somersworth. In the spring of 1831, Mr. Blackaller removed to Salmon Falls to take charge of an Episcopal Church (Christ Church) just then established there. In the Convention journal of 1832, Mr. Blackaller reports that since the month of February, 1832, "he has held occasional services in the increasingly populous village of Dover." Friday evening, Feb. 15, 1832, he reports "that our venerable prelate (the late Right Rev. Alexander V. Griswold) preached in the Congregational place of worship in Dover on the doctrines of the church before a numerous and respectable audience, with much apparent interest to all present." He adds that a church of our order is much desired by several respectable families in Dover, and expresses a belief in its ultimate establishment and success. The permanent establishment of this church in Dover is not due entirely or chiefly, however, to the efforts of Mr. Blackaller, but rather to the now venerable rector of St. John's Church, Charlestown, Mass., the Rev. Thomas R. Lambert, D.D., who in 1839, being chaplain in the navy, began the regular services of the church in what was then Belknap School, a wooden building, then situated on Church Street, since moved to Third Street, and occupied for business purposes. Sept. 2, 1839, gentlemen interested in the formation of a church met in this school-house and entered into an association for this purpose. The signers of the original articles of association were Asa A. Tufts, Richard Steele, Caleb Duxbury, Thomas C. Oakes, William Williamson, Thomas Hough, Stephen Hardy, William Johnson, Daniel Hallam, Samuel H. Parker, Sanborn B. Carter, Thomas R. Lambert, Charles Husband, Edward Husband, Thomas Hampton, James Duxbury, Charles W. Woodman, John Duxbury. The church was called St. Thomas' Church.

Dec. 1, 1839, Rev. William Horton, before rector of Trinity Church, Saco, became rector of St. Thomas' Church, Dover. In 1840 a lot of land was bought on what is now the corner of Central and St. Thomas Street, then a part of the Atkinson estate. A church building was erected and finished January, 1841, at the cost of $5800. The first service was held in the new church Jan. 17, 1841. The church was consecrated by Bishop Griswold, March 17, 1841. August, 1841, the parish consisted of sixty families and forty communicants. Rev. Mr. Horton resigned his rectorship Nov. 10, 1847. The Rev. Thomas G. Salter became rector Dec. 12, 1847. In 1860 gas was put into the church, and the church bell was hung. July 1, 1861, Mr. Salter resigned his rectorship, and Sept. 1, 1861, Rev. Edward M. Gushee became the rector. During our late civil war Mr. Gushee was chaplain of the Ninth New Hampshire Regiment, and in his absence Rev. Charles Wingate officiated as rector. Mr. Gushee resigned in April, 1864. Dec. 1, 1864, the Rev. John W. Clark became the rector. Mr. Clark resigned Sept. 16, 1866. Feb. 3, 1867, Rev. George G. Field was chosen rector. Mr. Field resigned Aug. 16, 1868. Rev. John B. Richmond became rector Nov. 8, 1868. During the rectorship of Mr. Richmond the church building was altered inside and out, and its seating capacity increased. Mr. Richmond resigned April 29, 1876, and the present incumbent, the Rev. Ithamar W. Beard, was chosen rector, and entered upon his duties Nov. 5, 1876. At present the number of families in the parish is about 150; the number of communicants, 106; the Sunday-school, 150 teachers and pupils. The parish has been subject to the usual changes incident to a manufacturing town. It ranks perhaps third or fourth in order among the parishes of this church in New Hampshire.

Washington Street Free-Will Baptist Church.—The church was organized in the Central Street vestry, Feb. 4, 1840. The first covenant was signed by thirteen persons, as follows: William Burr, Enoch Mack, Tobias Scruton, Jonathan C. Gilman, Asa H. Littlefield, M. D. L. Stevens, E. B. Chamberlain, Alfred Scruton, Lucy Y. Foss, Eunice Colbath, Elance Fuller, Chloe Holt, Mary Willard.

Of these only three are now living. The first settled pastor was Rev. J. B. Davis. He entered upon his pastorate the 1st of November, 1840, and remained but one year.

The subsequent pastors have been as follows: Rev. A. K. Moulton, settled in 1841, remained one year; Rev. R. Dunn, settled in 1843, remained one year; Rev. Elias Hutchins, settled in 1845, remained thirteen years; Rev. Charles E. Blake, settled in 1866, remained but one year; Rev. Willet Vary, settled in 1859, closed his labors in 1866; Rev. I. D. Stewart, settled in 1867, remained until 1874; Rev. G. C. Waterman, began his pastorate in 1874, and closed in 1879. The present pastor, Rev. Frank K. Chase, began in October, 1879.

Three hundred and thirty-six converts have been baptized by the pastors. The whole number connected with the church to date is about seven hundred and ten. The church has always been forward in all benevolent work, has been actively engaged in the Sunday-school work, and has enjoyed the presence and counsel of many noble men and women. Upon all great moral questions she has spoken with no uncertain voice.

The services were held at first in the Central Street vestry. When that became crowded they were removed to what was then known as the "Belknap school-house," standing in the rear of the First Parish Church. After that the services were held for a time in the old court-house. The first house of worship owned by the society was the building on Washington Street now known as the Morning Star building.

This was dedicated Sept. 21, 1843. During the pastorate of Rev. I. D. Stewart the society sold out its interest in this building, and erected its brick church on Washington Street. This was dedicated

Oct. 28, 1869. During the last ten or twelve years the church has been quite unfortunate in losing many prominent members by death and removal.

The erection of its house of worship left quite a burden of debt upon the society.

The last of this debt was paid before the close of the last financial year. The society was well united, and the church was making plans for a broader and better work.

On the morning of Tuesday, May 21, a fire broke out in a small brush-factory near the church. The fire soon spread to the church itself, and in a painfully short time the church was a mass of smouldering ruins. In the afternoon a heavy wind blew the northern gable over. The bricks fell upon the audience-room floor, crushing it like an egg-shell.

A number of persons were standing in the vestry, and five of them were buried beneath the ruins. Four of these were taken out alive. The fifth, Judge John R. Varney, was not missed until late at night. A midnight search was made, and he was found crushed and dead under the bricks and broken timbers.

At an informal meeting of the society, held on Wednesday evening, in the chapel of the First Parish, it was decided to accept the offer of the Belknap Church, which is at present without a pastor and is not holding regular services. The first service in this church was held Sunday, May 7th. The rebuilding of the church, much improved, is (1882) rapidly progressing.

Belknap Congregational Church.—This church was the result of public worship begun in the town hall by Rev. Benjamin F. Parsons, after his resignation of the First Church, from which he was dismissed Sept. 3, 1856. A Sabbath-school was organized July 6, 1856, with forty-five scholars. A society was organized July 7, 1856, and the church Sept. 3, 1856, with forty-four members. The corner-stone of the house of worship was laid July 4, 1859, and the house was dedicated Dec. 29, 1859. Rev. Mr. Parsons was dismissed, on his resignation, Oct. 24, 1861. His successors in service have been Charles H. Pratt, James B. Thornton (began December, 1861), E. A. Spence, Eyre Haskell (began in 1862), Charles C. Watson (installed July 11, 1867), J. W. Savage, Frank Haley, Isaiah P. Smith, James De Buchananne (from 1877 to 1882).

The Advent Christian Church was organized May 4, 1881, by a body of Christians who had worshiped in houses and halls since 1843, having been literally without a resting-place during that period.

At a meeting of the society and its friends in the spring of 1881, George E. Durgin, John Brooks, and William H. Viceroy were appointed to contract for the building of a house of worship.

It was built from the plans and under the direction of George Brown, the architect, at a cost of five thousand dollars,—Jacob Emery, contractor and builder. The seats are free and the church is supported by free-will offerings. The building contains an audience-room thirty-six by forty-eight feet, and a vestry in the basement twenty-four by thirty-six.

The house was dedicated April 16, 1882, by a sermon preached by Elder John Couch, of Lawrence, Mass.

There had been no settled minister until September, 1882, when Elder William H. Mitchell, of Kennebunk, Me., received and accepted a unanimous call to be their pastor.

CHAPTER CXXIII.

THE PRESS—SCHOOLS—BANKS.

The Press of Dover.—Dr. Belknap, the distinguished historian of the State, was the minister of Dover from 1767 to 1786, and was a frequent correspondent of the Gazette, especially in the trying times of the Revolution, when his patriotic productions did much to uphold the cause of the colonists against the mother-country. The first volume of his "History of New Hampshire," written at Dover, was issued from the press of Philadelphia in 1784, the printers of that city being at that time the most accomplished workmen in the country. The second volume, issued after the author had left the State, was printed in Boston in 1791.

Eliphalet Ladd, who came to Dover from Massachusetts about the year 1790, was the pioneer in newspaper printing in Strafford County. His paper, which was entitled The Political and Sentimental Repository or Strafford Register, was started July 15, 1790. The title after a few months was abbreviated to The Political Repository and Strafford Recorder, and as such published until Jan. 19, 1792, when the printing-office was destroyed by fire. Mr. Ladd either saved enough of his material or immediately procured a new outfit, and started another paper, which he called The Phoenix, so named, doubtless, from the fact that it sprang from the ashes of its predecessor. This he continued to publish until Aug. 29, 1795, when he sold the establishment to his brother-in-law, Samuel Bragg, Jr., who had served his apprenticeship in the office.

Mr. Bragg changed the name of the paper to The Sun, Dover Gazette, and Strafford Advertiser, and continued its publication from Sept. 5, 1795, to December, 1811. Its publication was interrupted for a short time in December, 1810, when the office was again burned, and with it not only the printing material but a large stock of books,—the printer keeping a book-store in connection with his office,—and a large portion of an edition of Belknap's "History of New Hampshire," which he was then printing.

Another edition of this history was printed in 1812, by John Mann and James K. Remick, and in 1830 the last edition, with the notes of Dr. Farmer, was published by Ela & Wadleigh, from the press of the Dover Enquirer. Samuel Bragg, Jr., died in December, 1811. His father, Samuel Bragg, Sr., took the establishment and published the paper a few months, when he sold it to John Mann, who had served his time in the office. Samuel Bragg, Sr., was not a printer. He came from Massachusetts to Dover about 1790, and was a lumber dealer for a time. Subsequently he took up the business of carrying the mail on the up-country route, which he traveled on horseback. Starting from Portsmouth and taking Dover in his way, he traveled up one side of Winnisaukee Pond and down the other, distributing the letters and newspapers, generally occupying a week in his journey.

The only post-office in the county at the beginning of the century was in Dover, and the Son of that day has the post-master's advertisements of letters remaining in the office for people in Gilmanton, Sandwich, Tamworth, and other towns in the vicinity of the White Mountains.

Mr. Bragg afterwards removed to Barnstead, where he died. Mr. Ladd, the first printer, who married a daughter of the senior Mr. Bragg, died in Dover about 1805. Mr. Mann further abbreviated the title of the paper when he commenced its publication, July 4, 1812, by calling it the Dover Son, by which name it was issued until Aug. 18, 1818. It was then changed to the Stafford Register, and continued until Dec. 17, 1822, when it underwent another change and was known as the New Hampshire Republican.

Mr. Mann continued to print the paper, but it was edited by Col. Charles W. Cutter, of Portsmouth, who had removed to Dover and opened a law-office, but devoted his time principally to the advocacy of the election of Hon. Levi Woodbury to the office of Governor,—Mr. Woodbury being the candidate of the eastern section of the State against Samuel Dinsmoor, who was supported in the western and northern counties.

This was near the close of Mr. Monroe's "era of good feeling" among politicians, when party lines were pretty much obliterated. Judge Woodbury was elected, receiving a vigorous support from Col. Cutter in the Republican. The colonel was an active politician, and one of the most vigorous newspaper writers of the time.

Mr. Woodbury in his administration of the office of Governor had the bad luck to disappoint the most of those who had voted for him, and failed of a reelection the next year. Col. Cutter had previously relinquished the editorial charge of the Republican, Oct. 14, 1823, and returned to Portsmouth. Mr. Mann continued its publication until Oct. 30, 1829, when it was discontinued, having existed under various names and different publishers for the period of about thirty-nine years.

The politics of the paper, so far as it had any, especially in its earlier days, were mildly Federal, warming up in hot party times, but generally meddling little with political matters further than to publish occasional extracts from the Boston Courier and other leading party organs of that day, and giving room quite impartially when occasion required to the communications of writers on both sides of the political wedge. The editors at that time were more addicted to the use of paste-pot and scissors than the quill, and considered their duty discharged when they had furnished their readers with the latest foreign news (three months old), the proceedings of Congress (three weeks old), and the few items of domestic and local intelligence which they could conveniently gather up. A "stickful" of "matter" for a "leader" was a rare achievement, and this was very apt to relate to what was of little or no consequence to anybody.

Nearly all the original matter which the papers contained was furnished by the leading politicians of the time, who under the signatures of "Cincinnatus," and "Cato" and "Brutus" and other ancient worthies were accustomed to give to the readers of newspapers that information on political affairs which their successors now impart from the stump.

For thirty-five years the Dover Son shone for all in the old county of Strafford, no other paper being published within its borders except for a short time at Gilmanton, to be hereafter mentioned.

In 1825, when the supporters of Gen. Jackson began to gather up their strength for a successful battle for the Presidency, James Dickman came to Dover from Maine, and commenced the publication of the Dover Gazette and Stafford Advertiser as an organ of the Democratic party. The first number was issued Dec. 14, 1825. He continued till June 5, 1827, when he sold out to John T. Gibbs and Joseph Turner, both of Portsmouth, who had been journeymen in the office. Gibbs and Turner continued the publication until July 13, 1830, when Mr. Turner retired, and Mr. Gibbs remained sole proprietor until August, 1858, when he sold the establishment to Dr. Joseph H. Smith and Joshua L. Foster. Mr. Foster retired in 1861, and the paper was then published by Edwin A. Hills for the proprietor until January, 1868, when Everett O. Foss assumed the publication, continuing until August, 1868. Mr. Hills again became the publisher, with A. L. Mellons as editor. In October, 1871, the printing-office of the Gazette was removed to Lowell, Mass., where the paper was printed in connection with the Middlesex Democrat, but it was published and circulated in Dover and its vicinity.

In 1828 the Republican supporters of Mr. Adams, feeling the need of another paper, induced Mr. Samuel C. Stevens, a bookseller in Dover, to commence the publication of the Stafford Enquirer, which he did Feb. 26, 1828. Richard Kimball, Esq., was the first editor of the paper.

July 29, 1828, the establishment passed into the hands of George W. Ela, and the name of the paper was changed to The Dover Enquirer. After the defeat of Mr. Adams in November of that year, The Signs of the Times, a Republican paper, which had been published about two years in Portsmouth, by Hampton Cutts and George K. Sparhawk, was united to the Enquirer, and it was continued as The Times and Enquirer until Jan. 1, 1830, when George Wadleigh became joint proprietor and editor with Mr. Ela. The title of the Times was dropped, and the paper was published under the firm of Ela & Wadleigh until May, 17, 1831, when Mr. Ela disposed of his interest to Mr. Wadleigh, removed to Concord, and became one of the proprietors of the New Hampshire Statesman.

The publication of the Enquirer was continued by Mr. Wadleigh until Jan. 1, 1868, when he sold the establishment to John R. Varney and Joseph T. S. Libbey, who published it under the firm-name of Libbey & Co. Mr. Varney met with an accidental death May 2, 1882, but the paper is continued with the same title and under the same names as publishers. It early took rank as the leading Republican paper in Southeastern New Hampshire, which position it has always sustained. It is a thirty-six-column paper, well printed and patronized.

The Dover Daily Republican was started as a Republican campaign paper, Aug. 2, 1880, and published under the management of a committee until Nov. 8, 1880, when it was taken by Libbey & Co., who have continued the publication of it up to the present time. It has twenty-eight columns, is printed on good paper and clear type, and receives its share of the public patronage.

The New Hampshire Globe, a Democratic paper, by Edwin R. Locke & Co., commenced May 18, 1833, and discontinued Sept. 18, 1834. Mr. J. F. C. Hayes, one of the firm, was afterwards connected with papers at Lancaster, Haverhill, Lawrence, and other places.

The Weekly Visitor, a small sheet, was issued Jan. 16, 1844, by Marquis D. L. Stevens, and continued a few weeks.

The Disciple, a monthly publication by Rev. E. Mack, was issued for several months in Dover prior to 1850, and its publication afterwards transferred to New York.

The Dover Telegraph, a small sheet of a miscellaneous character, by T. W. Caldwell and others, was published from Sept. 25, 1846, until April, 1848, when it was issued daily for a few weeks and discontinued.

The Weekly Sketcher, a literary and miscellaneous publication, by John B. Wood, Jr., was issued in Dover for a short time in 1848, when it was removed to Great Falls.

The Advertiser, a small daily sheet, was published for a few weeks in the summer of 1848 by Edward N. Fuller.

The Dover Sentinel, a Democratic paper, by John T. Gibbs & Co., G. H. & S. E. Twombly, and others, was published from May 4, 1860, to January, 1861, and discontinued.

The Daily Bee was commenced March, 1870, and continued until August following by A. B. Berry.

The New Hampshire Chronicle, commenced June 5, 1830, by Charles C. P. Moody, was continued until March 17, 1832, when it was discontinued and its subscription lists transferred to the New Hampshire Observer at Concord. The Chronicle was neutral in politics, devoting its columns chiefly to religious matters, temperance, &c.

The New Hampshire Palladium, a Democratic paper, by Joseph Turner, then recently of the Gazette, was published from Sept. 7, 1830, to Aug. 28, 1832, and discontinued.

The Unitarian Monitor, devoted to the interests of the religious denomination of that name, commenced by John Mann, April 29, 1831, was published in quarto size once in two weeks until April 29, 1834, when its title was altered to The Monitor, and the paper was removed to Concord, where it was published by other parties until June, 1836.

The Local Record, commenced January, 1870, was published monthly until May, 1872, and since that time occasionally by Everett O. Foss.

The State Press, a Democratic paper, issued weekly, was commenced May, 1874. Nov. 1, 1878, a company was formed for its publication. Its present managers are Dr. Paul A. Stackpole, Dr. Andrew J. Young (treasurer), and James W. Henderson (secretary).

Foster's Democrat, a weekly newspaper, was established in the city of Dover, N. H., in January, 1872, by George J. Foster & Co., and has been issued on Friday of each week ever since. On the 18th of June, 1873, the same firm issued the first number of Foster's Daily Democrat. On these journals J. L. Foster is employed as the editor, and his two sons, George J. and Charles G., are the business managers. The daily venture was made as an experiment, the success of which was at that time generally considered to be very doubtful. But the proprietors decided to push it at all hazards. They thought they knew their business, and the result has proved that they were not mistaken. Several previous attempts had been made by other parties to establish and sustain a daily newspaper in Dover, but they had always failed for lack of experience and business capacity of the projectors. But the senior Foster in this case had seen a good many years of editorial experience, while the juniors were practical printers and trained in the business management of a daily newspaper. In these weekly and daily enterprises the proprietors started out full of pluck and energy, determined, as they said, to make things lively, and treat everybody and all subjects fairly, squarely, and honestly, giving all sides in all cases a chance to be heard, and granting all shades of honest opinion a medium of expression before the public.

Although these journals are Democratic in politics, yet they are boldly independent, running with no machine as such, the organs of no ring, wearing nobody's collar, and will submit to no dictation in regard to their conduct or management from any source whatever. They have a large and increasing circulation, their advertising support is liberal and generous, and alike profitable to publishers and patrons. The senior Foster, assisted by such local and other reporters as may be necessary, devotes his whole time and attention to the editorial conduct of the papers, while the two sons have entire charge of the printing and business departments, employing the competent subordinates necessary to meet all requirements.

Connected with these newspapers is a large and well-appointed job printing-office, with good workmen constantly employed. The whole establishment is provided with the best modern machinery, driven by steam-power, and its several departments are continuously engaged in thrifty and profitable business. The newspapers are well conducted and enterprising, and have an extensive reading and large influence in the community. Starting with very meagre means, the concern has grown to yield a handsome income, and is a very valuable property as well as an important journalistic enterprise of the city and State.

The Free-Will Baptist Printing Establishment.

—This large and prosperous religious publishing house, the property of the Free-Will Baptist denomination, has been situated in Dover since 1833. The original "Book Concern" of the denomination was established in Limerick, Me., as early as 1831, with Rev. David Marks as agent. Two years later the "Book Concern" was removed to Dover, which place still remains the headquarters of the publishing interests of the Free-Will Baptist denomination. In 1835, Mr. Marks resigned his agency, and the denomination, through its General Conference, appointed a board of trustees, eleven in number, to conduct the business of its "Concern" or printing establishment. Of this board, William Burr was made the financial agent, in which capacity, among others, he served the establishment until his death in 1866. The establishment obtained an act of incorporation from the New Hampshire Legislature in 1846. Mr. Burr was succeeded in the agency by Rev. Silas Curtis, whose engagement was merely temporary. He was followed in 1867 by Mr. L. W. Burlingame. Rev. I. D. Stewart, the present agent, came to the position in 1873. The management of the establishment as now constituted consists of a board of corporators, thirteen in number, of which Rev. Dexter Waterman is president.

The principal publication issued by the printing establishment is The Morning Star, a weekly religious paper of eight pages. It was originally published in Limerick, Me., its first number bearing date May 11, 1826, and is, therefore, one of the oldest religious weeklies in this country. It was started and owned at first by private individuals, but was conducted in the interests of the Free-Will Baptist denomination. In 1832 the Star became by purchase the property of the denomination. William Burr was chosen editor, and served in this capacity until his death, as before stated, in 1866. Rev. George T. Day, D.D., was editor from 1866 until 1875. He was succeeded by Mr. G. F. Mosher, whose resignation of the editorship was accepted in 1882. The present editor is Rev. C. A. Bickford. The Star has a large circulation, and is generally recognized as one of the prominent and influential religious weeklies of the land. Its history has been a particularly creditable one in connection with the great questions of anti-slavery and moral reform. It has been several times enlarged, and is steadily growing in excellence and popular favor.

In 1845 the printing establishment began the publication of The Myrtle, a paper for Sunday-school scholars. It was favorably received, and attained a circulation of ten thousand copies in 1855, which was increased to sixteen thousand in 1875. It has been edited by various individuals, and has been once enlarged since it was founded.

In 1873 The Little Star, a paper similar to The Myrtle, but of higher grade, was established, to be issued in the alternate weeks with the Myrtle. Both papers are now well sustained.

The establishment has also published Sunday-school Lesson Leaves, of two grades, for several years past, treating the International Series of Sunday-school Lessons, and in 1880 began the publication of the "Star Quarterly," a carefully prepared help in the study and teaching of those lessons. It will hereafter publish "Leaves" of three grades,— "Primary," "Junior," and "Senior,"—in addition to the "Quarterly," which will contain full notes and various helps in connection with each lesson. All the Sunday-school publications are prepared under the editorial supervision of Rev. G. C. Waterman, whose time is wholly given to this department of the work.

The establishment also publishes a variety of denominational books, among which may be mentioned Prof. J. J. Butler's "Theology and Commentary," the "Centennial Record," "History of the Free-Will Baptists," "Christian Baptism," "Life of George T. Day," "Life of William Burr," and a volume of sermons entitled "Doctrine and Life."

Concerning Schools.—What Dover did in the earliest days we cannot learn. Parson Hanserd Knollys, minister here 1638 to 1641, graduated at Cambridge, England; after he left Dover was a teacher in England, and he had plenty of time when in Dover to teach the few children. Parson Daniel Maude, minister here 1642 to 1655, graduate of Emanuel, Cambridge, England, in 1606, A.M. 1610, was a teacher in the Boston Latin School when called here to the pastorate. It would be surprising if he had not revived his masterly gifts on Dover Neck.

The first extant vote of the town was April 5, 1658, when it was voted that twenty pounds per annum be appropriated for the maintenance of a schoolmaster in Dover for "all the children," the master "to have the privilege of all strangers out of the township,"—by which we understand that he could charge a fee to all outside children,—and he was to teach reading, writing, casting accounts, and Latin. Charles Buckner was employed under this vote. We don't know where he came from. The town gave him some land. Perhaps he left town about April, 1662, as in that month he was chosen a jurymen, and a few weeks after a vacancy was filled. But perhaps not. He went to Boston. April 12, 1668, he and wife, Mary, of Boston, sold to Job Clements four acres in Dover, bounded east by the fore river, north by commons, west by highway, and south by lot where David Ludecus Edling used to live.

He taught Latin. John Reyner, Jr., son of old Parson John, was fitted by somebody, and went from Dover; perhaps taught by his father, more likely by Mr. Buckner. John graduated at Harvard in 1663, ranking third in his class,—the class numbering seven.

John Sullivan was once a teacher here. At a meeting of the selectmen on the 20th of May, 1723, it was ordered that two schoolmasters be procured for the town at a salary not exceeding thirty pounds each. "Mr. Sullefund" at that date agreed to serve "for three months sartin."

Sullivan was an Irishman, of liberal education, who is said to have come to this country in 1723, and he was a teacher for many years. He lived usually on the Berwick bank of the river at Salmon Falls, and died July, 1795, at a fabulous age. He was a man of marked ability, and his wife equaled him. It must have been due to his classical training that so many Somersworth boys were educated. The Sullivan pair raised boys of their own. One son was John Sullivan, major-general in the Revolution, a daring and gallant officer, who led the right wing at Trenton and did good service at Princeton, drove the British left at Germantown, devastated the settlements of the Six Nations, severely defeated the Indians under Brant and the Tories under Johnson, and was eminent in Congress and as president of New Hampshire. His tombstone is at Durham. The late Michael Reade always insisted that Gen. John was born on the Dover side of the river, while his parents were temporarily residing here during one of the father's teaching episodes in Dover, and that contemporaries had assured him of it. We ought to add that he foresaw the Revolution so clearly that as captain of militia he thoroughly drilled a Durham company, and led them in the capture of Fort William and Mary, Dec. 14, 1774, which was the first act of war in opposition to the crown.

James Sullivan was another son of the Dover schoolmaster. The fracture of a limb prevented his entering military service, and so he took the lower positions of judge of the Superior Court, member of Congress, councilor, judge of probate in Boston, and Governor of Massachusetts.

Descendants of both these brethren have shown that the Sullivan blood is good blood.

Samuel Hale was a teacher here in 1745 and thereabouts. He was a son of Samuel Hale, and grandson of Rev. John Hale, the first minister of Beverly. Samuel was born 24th August, 1718, graduated at Harvard College 1740. How long he was in Dover we don't know. But he raised a company here in the old French war, and participated in the capture of Louisburg. He was for many years teacher in the Portsmouth grammar school, and by and by was judge of the Court of Common Pleas. He died in July, 1807. The late Hon. William Hale, of Dover, who was in Congress six years, was his son; and his son William needs no introduction to Dover people.

When the news of the declaration of independence reached Dover, that ardent patriot Rev. Jeremy Belknap went at once to the public school. It was kept in the little Quaker meeting-house, the winter one which stood in the same yard, back from the road and south of the large one. Some of our readers easily remember that building; it was taken down only about forty-seven years ago. Master Samuel Wigglesworth was the teacher. He was a physician, graduated at Harvard in 1752, and taught Latin.

Jesse Appleton was once a schoolmaster in Dover. It was somewhere between the date of his graduation at Dartmouth, in 1792, and his ordination as minister at Hampton. He became a Doctor of Divinity and president of Bowdoin College. His daughter Jane was the wife of President Franklin Pierce.

In his day there was but one town school, and it alternated, half and half, between the Pine Hill school-house and one that stood on the old road (then the main road) which runs by George W. Page's to the Upper Factory District. The school-house was perhaps half a mile in on that road. This was so long continued that the late Col. Andrew Peirce used, when a boy, to travel there to school.

Parson Robert Gray used to both teach and preach. Salary was small, and he added to it by occasionally keeping the town school. He was minister here from 1787 to 1805. He lived in the house now occupied by Reuben H. Twombly, on Pleasant Street. It was built for a parsonage when he came here. He was a classical scholar, and at first was a remarkable total abstinence man.

In 1837 the common schools were given a great impetus when Enoch S. Sherman took charge of the "Landing School" of District No. 2, in 1837, with Mary H. Wiggin for assistant. He was, for his time, an exceedingly able teacher. The school had long been called a "hard one," but under his management it became one of the best in the State. The school was in session thirty-nine weeks, and one hundred and twenty-six pupils attended. In addition to common-school studies, Latin, surveying, algebra, astronomy, philosophy, and book-keeping were taught. In 1838, Mr. Sherman had for assistants William G. Mitchell and Sophia Smith. Length of school, in weeks, forty-one; whole number of scholars, two hundred and twenty; and mental philosophy, rhetoric, chemistry, and elocution were added to the course. In 1847 Susan A. Mason was assistant. By this time an able teacher had been secured for the Fourth Street school, Abner J. Nutter, now living, and in consequence the number at the "Old Landing" had fallen to eighty-nine, but geometry was added to the course of study.

In 1848, S. Amanda Nason and Lydia G. Foss were assistants. Length of school, in weeks, thirty-seven; whole number of different pupils, one hundred and ninety-one. Latin was dropped by order of committee, as a study not sanctioned by State law. Mr. Sherman, exclusive of board, thirty-five dollars per month. Miss Nason received, including board, fourteen dollars; Miss Foss, twelve dollars.

Abner J. Nutter took the school in 1850, with Rebecca C. Smith as assistant, remaining for several years, and fitting the first class which entered the high school. By this time the practice of sending apprentices and overgrown farm boys to school in the winter had ceased. Mr. Nutter's average of enrolled scholars till the opening of the high school was one hundred and nine.

In 1848 the Legislature passed an act permitting contiguous districts to unite for the support of a high school. Districts No. 1 and 2 ought to have united; they couldn't agree; whereupon District No. 2 voted to build. The building committee was Dr. Joseph H. Smith, chairman; Samuel H. Parker, secretary; William Barr, Dr. Levi G. Hill, Nathaniel Paul. The building was finished September, 1851. October 6th following forty-four pupils occupied the building, with Moses L. Morse, graduate from Bowdoin, and Miss Mary S. Grant as teachers. Principal's salary eight hundred dollars per annum.

In 1870 the twelve school districts of the city were united, and the high school thrown open to the whole city. The principals of the high school have been M. L. Morse, D. O. Quimby, E. M. Hussey, M. L. Morse, Thomas Tash, Samuel G. Haley, William Webster, John W. Allard, Henry P. Warren, E. D. Mason, H. H. Hart, E. A. Greeley, E. R. Goodwin.

In 1849, in accordance with the provisions of the Somersworth act of the year previous, District No. 1 began to grade their schools. District No. 2 soon followed, and because of opening its high school was able to perform the work in a more thorough and satisfactory manner. Nathaniel Hills is still a resident in Dover, and a graduate of Dartmouth; was also a noted and successful teacher.

For several years past the city has employed a superintendent of schools. The present superintendent is Channing Folsom. The amount appropriated for public schools is between twenty and twenty-five thousand dollars annually.<sup>1</sup>

CHAPTER CXIV.

SOCIETIES—PHYSICIANS, ETC.

Masonic History.—Federal Lodge was organized by a dispensation from the Grand Lodge of New Hampshire, Aug. 29, 1792.

The following Masons, members of different lodges, were present at the first meeting on that date: Theophilus Dame, Amos Cogswell, Samuel Place, Jonathan Rawson, Nathan Hoit, Henry Mellen, William King, James Taylor.

Asa Tufts, a merchant in Dover, was the first Mason made in the lodge. He was subsequently an officer. He was the father of Asa A. Tufts, Esq., for many years cashier of the Strafford Bank.

The lodge held meetings regularly until May 8, 1797, when it became dormant.

Strafford Lodge, No. 29, was organized by a charter from the Grand Lodge of New Hampshire, July 5, 1817.

John Williams, agent for the Cochecho Manufacturing Company, was the first Master. The other officers were Joseph H. Gage, S. W.; William Palmer, J. W.; Andrew Peirce, Sec. and Treas.; Henry Quimby, S. D.; Winthrop Adams, J. D.; James Whitehouse, Tyler. It continued to prosper for several years, but, owing largely to the anti-Masonic troubles of the times, surrendered its charter in 1834. Its last representative to the Grand Lodge was John H. White, in 1833.

On the 11th of March, 1848, a petition was signed by some of the old members of Strafford Lodge for a restoration of its charter. The petition was granted, and the following officers were elected and installed: Andrew Peirce, W. M.; Moses Paul, S. W.; Benjamin Wiggin, J. W.; William Stern, Treas.; John H. White, Sec.; Asa A. Tufts, S. D.; George Pijer, S. D.; Nathaniel R. Hill, Elhanan W. Fenner, Stewards; Thomas R. Lambert, D. D., Chap.; Eri Perkins, Marshal; Charles Paul, Tyler. Rev. Dr. Lumber and Asa A. Tufts are the only members of the above list now living.

Capt. Moses Paul was the next Master, and he remained in office six years. To his warm interest in Masonry and wise judgment the lodge largely owes its prosperity during his term of office and its subsequent success.

Federal Lodge held its meetings at the tavern of Col. Amos Cogswell. Strafford Lodge was first organized at the tavern of Samuel Wyatt. It afterwards held its meetings in the third story of the brick block on the southwest corner of Pleasant and Silver Streets, subsequently in the second story of Franklin Academy, which it occupied when it became dormant. On the revival of the lodge it occupied its former hall in Franklin Academy. In 1857 it removed to its present hall on Central Street, which has been recently refitted in modern style.

The present number of members is two hundred and thirty-eight. It has an invested fund of three thousand five hundred and forty-two dollars and eighty-seven cents.

Belknap Chapter, No. 8, was organized by a charter from the Grand Chapter of New Hampshire, Jan. 20, 1826, and the following officers were elected and installed:

Andrew Peirce, M. E. H. P.; John Williams, E. K.; Moses Paul, E. S.; John W. Mellen, C. H.; Asa A. Tufts, P. S.; Samuel Hale, R. A. C.; Isaac L. Folsom, Sec.; John Chase, Treas.; Rev. John M. Moffit, Chap.

After a successful career of some years it surrendered its charter in 1834.

In 1850 a petition was signed by the Capitular Masons in Dover, and it was restored September 1st of that year, and the following officers were elected and installed:

Moses Paul, M. E. H. P.; Joshua Edwards, E. K.; John H. White, E. S.; Ichabod G. Jordan, C. H.; Stephen P. Palmer, P. S.; Benjamin Wiggin, R. A. C.; George Piper, Sec.; John Burns, Treas.; Rev. Justin Spalding, Chap.

None of the above officers are now living.

The chapter has had a prosperous career, now numbers two hundred and eighteen members, and has an invested fund of two thousand five hundred and fifty-six dollars and seventy-seven cents.

Orphan Council, No. 1 is the oldest council in the State. It was organized April 23, 1832. The following officers were elected and installed: Samuel C. Brickot, T. I. G. M.; Jonathan Edwards, D. G. M.; William North, Con.; William H. Hatch, Treas.; James H. Blinn, Rec. It became dormant in 1834. In 1858 a petition was sent for its restoration. The same was granted August 28th of that year, and the following officers were elected and installed: Samuel Dunster, T. I. G. M.; Moses Paul, R. I. G. M.; Jonathan Edwards, I. G. M.; Ichabod G. Jordan, Treas.; Mark Noble, Rec. The council numbers one hundred and sixty-three members, and has an invested fund.

St. Paul Commandery was organized Nov. 7, 1857, by authority of a dispensation from the Grand Encampment of the United States. The following officers were elected and installed: Moses Paul, E. C.; Joshua Edwards, Gen.; Jacob C. Haulon, C. G.; John Twombly (2d), P.; George W. Bullock, S. W.; John H. White, T. W.; Mark Noble, Treas.; Charles Doe, Rec.; Andrew Peirce, S. B.; Oliver Chick, S. B.; Rufus W. Stevens, W. The commandery has had continued prosperity, now numbers one hundred and sixty-one members, and has a well-invested fund.

Odd-Fellowship.—Wecohamet Lodge, No. 3, I. O. O. F., was instituted Dec. 28, 1843, with twenty-eight members. Three of these charter members are now living, viz.: Rev. Eben Francis, Cambridgeport, Mass.; Seth S. Moulton, Boston Highlands, Mass.; John H. Wiggins, London, England. The lodge has shown a constant increase, and on the 1st of July, 1882, numbered three hundred and ten.

Mount Pleasant Lodge, No. 16, I. O. O. F., was instituted Feb. 11, 1846.

The officers elected and installed were James M. Flagg, N. G.; Thomas E. Sawyer, V. G.; John H. Wiggin, Sec.; Seth S. Moulton, Treas. The charter members were John H. Wiggin, James M. Flagg, E. O. Laughton, John J. Davis, and Seth S. Moulton.

Owing to the records having been destroyed by fire at Manchester, Feb. 5, 1856, a very meagre account can be given of its early history. However, the lodge started with a bright and flattering prospect before it. Among the first to enlist under its banner were many prominent and enterprising citizens. It comprised professional men, business men, and mechanics. For a time it flourished beyond the most sanguine expectations of any one.

The initiation fee was five dollars; the degrees were three dollars each; the dues were seventy-five cents per quarter. It paid a perpetual sick benefit of one dollar to white, one dollar and a half to blue, and three dollars to scarlet, and a funeral benefit, on the death of a brother, of thirty dollars; on the death of a brother's wife, fifteen dollars.

Mount Pleasant Lodge, like many others all over the land, was left to dwindle and fall asleep. She gave the balance of her fund, one hundred and twenty dollars, for a library fund; and gave cards of clearance to all who were in good standing in the lodge at that time.

In 1849 a movement was started to emerge from Mount Pleasant and join Wecohamet. Accordingly it was decreed by a vote, fourteen to two, to unite with said lodge. This was agreed to by Wecohamet under certain stipulations that had been decided upon by a vote of twenty-one to ten.

On August 20th of the same year a memorial was presented to the Grand Lodge, I. O. O. F., by P. G. M. Parker, praying that they be united. At the same time a remonstrance was presented by P. G. Bamford; this was advocated by P. G. C. W. Woolman, and the Grand Lodge decided that there was no law whereby such an action could be obtained.

On the 9th of July following the lodge surrendered to the Grand Master the charter, books, and such other property as was then in its possession. There were thirty-seven members in good standing, namely: John H. Wiggin, S. S. Moulton, Oliver Tibbetts, William A. Perkins, Thomas L. Smith, Caleb Duxbury, Samuel Dunn, Jr., Oliver Wyatt, William Burley, Mark Thompson, Charles Paul, Isaac B. Brown, George P. Weeks, Alpheus Rogers, Daniel Bogle, James Kimball, Jacob K. Twombly, John Meserve, William L. Walker, Stephen Toppan, Benjamin

March 14, 1872, seven members of Wecohamet Lodge, No. 3, I. O. O. F., believing it to be for the best interest of the order to have another lodge in this city, took cards of clearance from No. 3, for the purpose of raising Mount Pleasant Lodge, to wit: Jonathan D. Stratton, George W. Gray (2d), James M. Farnham, Henry S. Gray, Ephraim H. Whitehouse, J. Frank Sloper, and Eric M. Hall.

The petitioners were William H. Hill, Calvin Hale, William Burley, Stephen Toppan, and John Meserva; and on the 26th the charter was presented to the petitioners, and the lodge resuscitated and put in motion.

There have been admitted by card and initiation to 1882, two hundred and eighty-six. Twenty-two have been suspended, one expelled, and we have lost seven by death. The present number is two hundred and forty-nine. Sixteen brothers have lost their wives by death. Our quarterly dues have been one dollar,—four dollars per annum. The market value of funds in the hands of trustees, in banks, bonds, and stocks, par value, with the interest that has accrued from investments, six thousand one hundred and thirteen dollars.

Prescott Encampment, No. 23, I. O. O. F., organized March 23, 1875. Charter members are as follows: Alonzo T. Pinkham, Charles T. Witham, Romanzo Trefethen, Frank P. Hodgson, Henry S. Gray, Josiah Stackpole, George D. Lamos, Horace Gowen, William H. Palmer, John W. Fogg.

Quochecho Encampment, No. 4, I. O. O. F., organized Oct. 30, 1844. The charter members were Samuel Parker, Eben Francis, William Fredick, Nathaniel Demeritt, Bethuel Keith, Jonathan Cuttler, E. O. Lawton.

Knights of Pythias.—Olive Branch, No. 6, K. T., instituted Oct. 20, 1870. Charter members: J. T. S. Libbey, George W. Gray, James A. Horne, J. Frank Seavey, Albert W. Cotton, Lauriston Chamberlain, Alonzo T. Pinkham, Jonathan D. Stratton, Henry M. Bacon, Herbert I. Hurd, H. H. Farnum, Moses Sanborn, Benjamin P. Varney, Parks W. Lord, George D. Nowell, Charles W. Yeaton.

S. Libbey, M. C. Lathrop, M. D., S. S. Mathews, Elvin C. Kinnear, John A. Glidden, John Colbath, Henry P. Glidden, William K. Chadwick.

United Order of the Golden Cross.—Dover Commaudery, No. 43, U. O. G. C., was instituted at Dover, Feb. 7, 1879, with the following persons as charter members: Joseph T. S. Libbey, G. C. Waterman, J. H. Winslow, Deborah H. Winslow, T. J. W. Pray, Charles A. Towne, John R. Varney, John C. Varney, Joanna M. Varney, John Baty, T. J. Smith, George B. Spalding, J. A. Wiggin, James H. Davis, Samuel Bonsor, Marietta S. Waterman, Abbie Clark, Charles E. Munock, Nathaniel Twombly, D. C. M. Pierce, Alvin A. Pierce, Jacob D. Young, and Daniel S. Ward.

The following officers were elected: G. C. Waterman, P. N. C.; T. J. W. Pray, N. C.; M. S. Waterman, V. N. G.; C. A. Towne, W. P.; T. J. Smith, W. H.; A. A. Clark, K. of R.; J. H. Davis, F. K. of R.; J. H. Winslow, T.; John Baty, W. I. G.; Samuel Bonsor, W. O. G.; J. T. S. Libbey was appointed Deputy Grand Commander.

This organization is composed of ladies and gentlemen. Its objects are social and moral improvement, to care for the sick and dying, and to provide a fund of from five hundred to ten thousand dollars to the family or dependents of every member at the time of their decease. It requires of its members abstinence from intoxicants, and a belief in the general truths of the Bible.

Dover Library.—Rooms, Cochecho Block, Washington Street; established December, 1850; President, Z. S. Wallingford; Directors, Z. S. Wallingford, John White, Nathaniel Twombly, Winslow Hall, Charles A. Tufts, James W. Bartlett; Treasurer, James W. Bartlett.

Dover Horse Railroad.—The charter for this road was obtained in June, 1881, and on July 3, 1882, the road was completed, and commenced operations. Route, Sawyer's Mills to Garrison Hill; distance, two and a third miles.

Capital stock, $30,000. President, Z. S. Wallingford; Treasurer, Harrison Haley; Secretary, Thomas J. Smith; Directors, Z. S. Wallingford, Charles H. Sawyer, James E. Lothrop, Charles M. Murphy, W. P. Hays, Simeon Littlefield, and Harrison Haley.

Statistics—Population.—There seems to have been no census of the town of Dover taken before the year 1767, at least we can find records of none earlier. In the absence of a complete table, however, a list of the tax-paying males may not be uninteresting; we commence with the first enumeration on record:

Banks in Dover.—The first bank in Dover was incorporated by the Legislature, by an act approved June 11, 1803, under the name of "The President, Directors, and Company of the New Hampshire Strafford Bank," "and shall so continue from the fourth day of July next until the expiration of twenty years next following."

"The capital stock of said corporation shall consist of a sum not less than $50,000, nor more than $150,000."

The corporators were William K. Atkinson, William Hale, Amos Cogswell, Ezra Green, John Wheeler, Henry Mellen, Daniel M. Durell, and Oliver Crosby. The first president was William King Atkinson. The following persons have also held the office of president: William Hale, John Wheeler, Oliver Crosby, Daniel Osborne, Moses Hodgdon. The first cashier was Walter Cooper. He left the bank in 1817; he died in about 1824; he was succeeded by William Woodman, who continued in office until the expiration of its State charter, about 1843. William Woodman was born in Newburyport, Mass., Dec. 18, 1782; and died Jan. 30, 1868.

A new act extending its charter was accepted at the annual meeting July 1, 1822.

The bank was kept in a two-story wooden building which was on the east side of Central Street, and nearly opposite Angle Street. About the year 1825 it was sold to Amos White and removed into Angle Street, where it still remains, and is owned and occupied as a dwelling-house by Patrick Kivel.

Amos White built a three-story brick building on the bank lot, the south part of which he occupied. The north part was built over and around the old stone vault, and was owned and occupied by the Strafford Bank during its existence as a State bank. That north part was afterwards sold to Wells Waldron, who now owns and occupies it as a dwelling.

We come now to its successor, the STRAFFORD BANK, July 9, 1846, an act was passed incorporating Daniel Osborne, William Hale, John H. Wheeler, D. M. Christie, Nathaniel Young, George Andrews, William Hale, Jr., Moses Paul, John Currier, Joseph Morrill, Jeremy Perkins, and William Woodman by the name and style of the Strafford Bank, to continue to June 1, 1867.

They organized Oct. 17, 1846, to commence business Jan. 4, 1847, the capital to be one hundred thousand dollars, increased to one hundred and twenty thousand dollars by vote July 7, 1857. The first board of directors were William Woodman, who died Jan. 30, 1868, aged eighty-five; D. M. Christie, died Dec. 8, 1876, aged eighty-six; John Currier, died June 7, 1860, aged sixty-two; Moses Paul, died July 9, 1860, aged sixty-three; Ezekiel Hurd, died Oct. 29, 1870, aged seventy-three; Nathaniel Young, died June 27, 1854, aged seventy-eight; Eleazer Davis Chamberlin, died Oct. 10, 1872, aged seventy-nine. After the death of two of the above, there were chosen as directors William Burr, who died Nov. 5, 1866, aged sixty; Noah Martin (Governor), died May 28, 1863, aged sixty-two.

William Woodman was chosen president, which office he held during the bank's existence as a State institution, to June 30, 1865.

Asa A. Tufts was chosen cashier, which office he held to June 30, 1865.

This bank in 1847 built the brick and stone building on Washington Street, opposite the City Hall, which is now occupied by the Strafford National Bank, and moved into it in November, 1847.

July 1, 1865, the Strafford Bank surrendered its State charter, and accepted a charter from the United States, under the name of the Strafford National Bank, to continue twenty years. The old officers—directors, president, and cashier—were re-chosen to the same offices in the new bank, and occupy and own the same building. Its capital is one hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

After the death of William Woodman, Jan. 30, 1868, E. D. Chamberlin and D. M. Christie were respectively chosen president, but declined serving, and William T. Stevens was chosen president.

Dec. 31, 1875, Asa A. Tufts resigned his office of cashier, having held the office over twenty-nine years. Elisha R. Brown was appointed his successor.

The bank's present charter will expire June, 1885. Directors in 1882: W. S. Stevens, Z. S. Wallingford, Charles Woodman, Jeremiah Smith, Charles H. Sawyer, Jeremiah Horne, John McDuffie.

THE SAVINGS-BANK FOR THE COUNTY OF STRAFFORD was chartered by an act passed June 27, 1823, for an indefinite period. John Williams, Daniel M. Durell, John Wheeler, and twenty others were corporators. It was the fifth savings-bank in the United States.

The first meeting was Feb. 7, 1824, John Wheeler being chosen chairman, and George Piper secretary.

John Wendell Mellen was the first treasurer. He was son of Rev. John Mellen (Harvard College, 1770), and graduated at Harvard College, 1815, and died 1829. He resigned his office March, 1829, and William Woodman was chosen treasurer March 28, 1829, and resigned the office Oct. 1, 1862, when Charles Woodman was chosen his successor.

Feb. 28, 1824, Stephen Hanson, of the Society of Friends, made the first deposit, which was for his sons, William and Albert.

Jan. 1, 1880. The whole number of depositors from the beginning was seventeen thousand six hundred. Amount of deposits Jan. 1, 1880, one million six hundred and ninety-three thousand four hundred and sixty dollars and thirty-three cents. Number of depositors, four thousand four hundred and fifty-one.

Stevens, Charles Woodman, Edmund J. Lane, Jeremiah Horne, Charles H. Sawyer, Samuel C. Fisher; Treasurer, Albert O. Mathes.

The second bank in Dover was the DOVER BANK, the first of that name, incorporated June 29, 1823. It must have commenced business about 1823, for the registry of deeds shows that the bank bought of the Dover Manufacturing Company, Sept. 1, 1823, the lot cornering on Washington and Central Streets, for $600.

In connection with the late Dr. Jacob Kittredge, the bank erected the brick building now standing on that spot, and in that building the bank was kept during its charter. In 1830 its capital was $125,000.

Its first cashier was John Wendell Mellen; its first president, Andrew Peirce; last president was Daniel M. Christie. He (Mellen) must have resigned as early as 1828, for in the year 1828 Jonathan Dame was chosen cashier, and probably held the office until the expiration of the charter in 1844.

Jonathan Dame was a good man, a member of the Society of Friends, and died at Newport, R. I., Oct. 31, 1865, aged seventy-nine years.

The books of this old bank were scattered, and could not be found. The above was obtained from other sources.

THE DOVER BANK, the second of the name. This new Dover Bank was incorporated June 26, 1845, to continue for twenty years from the first Monday in August, 1845.

April 21, 1846, this bank bought of the old Dover Bank its banking-house, vault, fixtures, and land, for $6000, and there transacted its business.

Joseph H. Smith, M.D., was its first and only president, and Andrew Peirce, Sr., was the cashier. The bank commenced banking May 4, 1846. March 29, 1855, A. Peirce resigned the cashiership, and Thomas L. Smith was chosen cashier. He held the office about nine years, when he was succeeded by George Neally, who held the office only a few months. He was followed in 1865 by Benjamin Barnes, Jr., and he was followed in 1866 by Calvin Hale, who continued until the final close of the bank in 1869.

THE LANGDON BANK was incorporated July, 1854; commenced business January, 1855. Capital, $100,000. The first president was Andrew Peirce, Jr.; second, Willis H. Esty, elected January, 1858; third and last, Samuel M. Wheeler, elected in 1862. The first and only cashier was Calvin Hale. The bank went into liquidation August, 1865. Its banking-room was in the brick building on Central Street, nearly opposite the Cochecho Company's counting-rooms.

Samuel M. Wheeler was president from March 2, 1865, to June 30, 1874, at which time Mr. Wheeler resigned, and on that day Oliver Wyatt was elected to that office, and has been president of the bank since.

THE COCHECHO BANK was incorporated by the State of New Hampshire, Sept. 1, 1851, for twenty years, with a capital of $100,000. The first president was Thomas Stackpole, up to the year 1863; then Thomas E. Sawyer to 1872. The first cashier was Ezekiel Hurd, who held the office to October, 1870. He died Oct. 29, 1870, aged seventy-three years. He was succeeded by Harrison Haley. In 1872 the bank closed its business as a State Bank. It renewed its business, and took a charter from the United States under the name of

THE COCHECHO NATIONAL BANK, with a capital of $100,000. Certificate is dated April 29, 1865. Its first president was Charles W. Thurston, who held the office until 1876, when James E. ## CHAPTER CXXV.

The War of 1861-65.—In the evening of the President's first call the citizens of Dover met in the City Hall. The mayor, Alphonso Bickford, presided. The first two speakers were John P. Hale and Joseph H. Smith, both recognized as leaders in the opposing political parties. The resolutions, introduced by Hon. Charles W. Woodman, and unanimously adopted, were these:

"Whereas the authority of the Federal Government of the United States has been denied, the Flag of the country fired upon, and the forts, arsenals, and other public property seized, and a series of outrages and wrongs perpetrated for months upon the Government, whose forbearance had been received as proof of pusillanimity, till open and flagrant war has been wantonly and causelessly waged upon the government and people of the United States, and the President has been forced to appeal to the People to maintain by force the honor, dignity, and continued existence of the Government they have established; therefore

"Resolved, In answer to said appeal of the President, that we, the citizens of Dover, feeling that our country is above party, hereby pledge ourselves to sustain the administration of the General Government in the manly and patriotic position assumed by the President in his recent proclamation, and that we cheerfully and readily tender to the Governor of this State, and through him to the President of the United States, our full proportion of such volunteer force as may be required of this State.

"Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed at this meeting to obtain the names of at least one hundred men, who will hold themselves ready at the shortest notice to march wherever the demands of the country and the order of the government shall require."

On Wednesday, the 17th, by authority of the Governor of this State, George W. Colbath opened a recruiting-office in our City Hall. On Thursday he informed the Governor that the first company was full. He was directed to proceed with enlistments. On the next Monday one hundred and fifty men were on the muster-roll.

On the 18th of April the City Councils voted to raise the flag upon the City Hall, to give the hall for a drill-room, and unanimously determined to assist the families of the soldiers in the following terms,—the beginning of aid cheerfully given for years:

"Whereas civil war has been inaugurated, our glorious Union assailed, and our institutions endangered; and

"Whereas our fellow-citizens promptly and cheerfully answered to the call of the government for aid in this its hour of peril; therefore

"Resolved, By the City Council of the city of Dover that the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be needed, be and hereby is appropriated for the benefits and wants of the families of those who have responded or shall respond to the call of the country for the support of the Constitution and Laws."

On the 23d the members of the Strafford Medical Association resident in Dover issued an offer to give their professional services gratuitously to those families; the first signature on the list appropriately being that of a distinguished fellow-citizen, Noah Martin, a former Governor of this State.

On the 26th one counted the flags that were floating in the air. There were forty of them from the houses in our streets:

Forty flags with their crimson bars."

On Monday, the 29th, the first two companies were to leave home, to become Companies A and B of the First New Hampshire. On the day before they had listened to a stirring sermon in the old First Church from a successor of that minister who had preached to the soldiers here on the same spot as they were to take up their march for Cambridge in 1775. At ten o'clock, Monday morning, they were in line in Central Square, 145 men in the ranks. Four thousand people witnessed the scene,—in the streets, from windows, from balconies, from the house-tops. The women had been working day by day to supply needed clothing, some of them whose tears dropped as they sewed. Prayer was offered by one who soon after himself went to serve in the war-vessels,—Rev. T. G. Salter.

A third company was meanwhile formed from the excess of enlistments. Orders now came, however, to receive only those who would enlist for three years. On the 11th of May the choice was given to each,—three years or be discharged.

Seventy-one on that day chose the three years, and five days afterwards the number was one hundred and four. On the 25th, that company left the city to become Company D in that gallant Second New Hampshire.

Of how many men this city furnished during the four years that followed the record is not perfect. Even in the imperfect rolls there were Dover men in each of the first fifteen regiments and in the Eighteenth, in the cavalry, the navy, and the marine corps. From the call of July 2, 1862, five hundred and eighty-two names are on record. Prior to that were all the first men of the first eight regiments, and of the sailors entering the navy before that date which should be added. Some examination of the rolls shows that more than eight hundred enlistments were made by this city of eight thousand five hundred inhabitants. This tells nothing of the sacrifices made. But of the number one hundred and eleven gave their lives to their country.

The shoin alone fell at Fair Oaks, Second Manassas, Fredericksburg, and Gettysburg, at Cold Harbor, and Burnside's Mine, and Deep Bottom, and Bermuda Hundreds, in the Wilderness, at Spottsylvania, and Weldon Railroad, and Petersburg, at Pocotaligo, and James Island and Wagner, and Port Hudson.

Dover men served in the Shenandoah and in the first disastrous march to Bull Run; they were in the Peninsula battles and marches; in the second battles before Washington; in the bloody charge at Antietam bridge. They were in the charge up the heights of St. Mary's. They were in the burning woods of Chancellorsville. They were where Lee hurled his legions against Cemetery Hill; in the long and bloody march from the Wilderness to Petersburg. They were in North Carolina, where the "swamp-angel" hurled death into Charleston, and on Florida rivers. They were with Burnside in Tennessee, and with Sherman back of Vicksburg. And they sailed the coast, and watched the harbors, and manned the war boats on the Mississippi.

The following is a list of soldiers from Dover who were killed or died in service during the war of the Rebellion:

NOAH MARTIN.

Noah Martin, son of Samuel and Sally Cochrane Martin, was born in Epsom, N. H., July 26, 1801.

His ancestors, both on the paternal and maternal side, were of that sterling class of settlers, the Scotch-Irish. Nathaniel Martin, the progenitor, who married Margaret Mitchell, had a son William, who came to this country with his father when he was a mere child. They settled in Londonderry, N. H. Samuel, son of William, was the father of the subject of this sketch. His mother, Sally, was the eldest daughter of Maj. James Cochrane, of Pembroke, N. H.

In early life Noah evinced an untiring love for books and a desire, as he advanced in life, to study for the medical profession as his future calling. He persevered through many difficulties until he had acquired a thorough classical and professional education. His medical studies were commenced under the instruction of Dr. Pillsbury, of Pembroke, N. H., being with him one year, and finished the two remaining years with Dr. Graves, of Deerfield.

He graduated at Dartmouth in the medical class of 1824, and soon after commenced the practice of his profession as partner with Dr. Graves, his former teacher, remaining with him one year. In 1825 he removed to Great Falls, and at once entered into a large and lucrative practice. Here he remained nine years, when he removed to Dover. He had established for himself at Great Falls an enviable reputation both as a physician and surgeon, and he soon gained at Dover the confidence and affection of the people. He was now considered one of the best physicians and surgeons in the State; in fact, the leading physician in this section and the consulting physician in difficult cases requiring superior medical skill. His natural dignity of mien and courteous bearing, united with his social qualities, pleasing address, and sympathetic heart, served to make him very popular. He was deeply devoted to his profession, pursuing it with a ceaseless ardor, giving it his greatest thought and study, and making many sacrifices of a personal nature for its benefit. All who sought his counsel found him faithful and sure, always ready with kind words of advice and encouragement, and in the many delicate offices connected with his profession he displayed that discriminating sense, judgment, and tact, conjoined with a nice observance of a tender and scrupulous confidence, which were among his characteristics, and endeared him to the hearts of his patients.

In politics Dr. Martin was a Democrat of the Jeffersonian and Jacksonian school. With but little ambition for political preferment he was not always able to resist the importunities of political and personal friends, and was often brought forward for political office. He was elected to the New Hampshire House of Representatives in 1830, 1832, and 1837; to the New Hampshire Senate in 1835 and 1836; and in 1852 and 1853 he was elected Governor of the State.

Dr. Martin was elected a member of the Strafford District Medical Society in 1835, and was chosen its president in 1841 and 1842; of the State Medical Society in 1836, and president in 1858; and member of the American Medical Association in 1849. He was one of the founders of the Dover Medical Association, and was chosen its first president in 1849, and also filled that office in 1850. He was elected a member of the New Hampshire Historical Society in 1853, the New England Historic Genealogical Society in 1853, and vice-president of the same for New Hampshire in 1855. He was one of the corporators of the State Agricultural Society, and was elected vice-president of the same in 1851. He was chosen president of the Savings-Bank for the County of Strafford in 1844, holding the office until 1852, when he declined a re-election; was a leading director of the Dover Bank from 1847 to 1855, when he resigned; also a director of the Strafford Bank from 1860 to the time of his death. He also held various other offices of trust. He was a member of the Masonic fraternity and also that of the order of Odd-Fellows.

He died suddenly on the morning of May 28, 1863. He expired as in a gentle slumber, so tranquil the flight of the spirit that the exact moment of its departure was hardly perceptible. He was a kind and affectionate husband and father, a wise counselor, and a true patriot.

In 1825, Dr. Martin married Mary Jane, daughter of Dr. Robert Woodbury, of Barrington, and their family consisted of two children,—Elizabeth A. and Caroline M., both of whom survive.

MOSES PAUL.

Moses Paul, only son of Edmund and Delia Paul, was born in Waterborough, near Alfred,<sup>1</sup> Me., March 28, 1797. Ten years later, in 1807, he came with his father's family to Dover. Here the youthful Moses received at the town school the elements of an education which was subsequently fostered and enlarged under the tuition of Mr. Willard Thayer, a successful teacher of a locally celebrated private school. Here he succeeded in securing an education that well qualified him for his subsequent successful business career.

He commenced his business education in the store of his maternal uncle, John Williams, Esq., who during that year associated himself with several gentlemen of wealth for the purpose of commencing the manufacture of cotton cloth in Dover. Mills were erected on the Cochecho River, about two miles from Dover Centre, and the business which has since grown to such gigantic proportions was commenced, with Mr. Williams as agent and Moses Paul, clerk.

In 1822 the same association of gentlemen, with others added, under the name of the Dover Manufacturing Company, commenced the erection of the first cotton-mill at the lower falls, Dover Centre.

In the year 1824, this mill having been completed, Mr. Williams became the agent of both establishments, while Mr. Paul was appointed superintendent of what was then called the "upper factory," where he resided until 1828.

In 1828, Mr. Williams was succeeded as agent by James F. Curtis, and at the same time Capt. Paul removed to the lower factory to assume the duties of superintendent of the manufacturing department here, in which position he continued until December, 1834, when he succeeded Mr. Curtis as agent of the corporation. Thus, step by step, he rose from clerk to agent of the Cochecho Manufacturing Company, and it is but justice to add that very much of the prosperity of the corporation from 1834 to 1860 was due to the skillful and prudent management of Moses Paul. He lived to see the small manufactory of 1812 developed into the giant corporation of 1860.

In all the delicate relations existing between a large manufacturing establishment and the town or city in which it may be located, Capt. Paul ever pursued a course so gentle, so conservative, and so liberal as to disarm prejudice and to secure mutual co-operation.

Capt. Paul manifested a lively interest in all matters tending to advance the welfare of his adopted city. He was president of the first City Council, was a director in the old Dover Bank, and upon the incorporation of the Strafford Bank became a director, which position he held until his death.

In Masonic circles he was a bright member, and from early life evinced the deepest interest in and cherished love for this ancient and honorable institution. He passed through all its degrees and honors, from the humble "Entered Apprentice" to Master of his lodge and Grand Master of all the lodges in the State of New Hampshire, and at the time of his death was Grand High Priest of the Grand Chapter of New Hampshire, and Eminent Commander of St. Paul's Commandery, of Dover.

The military also had a charm for Capt. Paul, and he became commander of the organization known as the "Strafford Guards" in the old militia days, thus conferring the title by which he was familiarly and commonly known. The company, like everything with which he was connected, felt the energy and enterprise of his spirit, and under his command was second to no similar organization in New Hampshire.

In religious matters he was a consistent Christian of the Calvinistic school, and was a member of the First Congregational Church in this city.

Of the cause of education Capt. Paul was a present and efficient friend, and all measures tending to advance that interest found in him an earnest advocate.

After a life of unusual activity and usefulness, death at last laid its hand upon the strong man, and July 9, 1860, he passed peacefully away,

"Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him and lies down to pleasant dreams."

Nov. 29, 1821, he married Susan M. Hodgdon, daughter of Shadrack and Elizabeth Hodgdon, of Dover, who survives him at the advanced age of eighty-four years, and retains in a wonderful degree the vigor and elasticity of youth.

Of their family three children are living, two daughters and a son,—Susan E., wife of John A. Bickford, of Malden, Mass.; Emily J., wife of Russel B. Wiggin, also of Malden; and Moses A. Paul, of this city.

GEN. ALFRED HOITT.

A man who entirely by his own efforts has risen to affluence and social position, and through all the changing events of an active business life has preserved his integrity unimpeached, well deserves the pen of the historian. Such an one is Gen. Alfred Hoitt, the subject of this sketch. Without the advantages of inherited aid he worked the problem of his own fortune, and lives to enjoy the fruition of a successful business career. He was born in Northwood, N. H., Jan. 11, 1806, and when two years of age his parents removed to Portsmouth, later to Madbury, and finally to Lee. His father died soon after their removal to Lee, leaving Alfred, then but thirteen years of age, the main support of his widowed mother. At seventeen years of age he went out for himself and engaged as a farm-hand in the town of Stratham for seven months at nine dollars per month. He saved every dollar of the money thus earned, which formed the nucleus of a small fund with which he subsequently purchased a piece of woodland, the first real estate owned by him, and which is still in his possession. This small purchase has increased from time to time until it now reaches nine hundred acres of excellent farming land, located within six miles of Durham depot.

In 1838 he erected a building in Lee and commenced keeping a public-house, which soon became famous as one of the best hostleries in New Hampshire. This was in the halcyon days of turnpikes and stage-coaches, when the blast of the horn and the merry crack of the drivers' whips were heard throughout the land.

Soon after the building of the Boston and Maine Railroad, which enterprise he assisted with his usual energy, he removed to Durham depot, where he erected a fine residence. At this time he was conducting a large and successful business in the shipping of produce to Boston, and for a number of years made the trip over the road daily to that city and return. He has paid in freights alone to the Boston and Maine Railroad between $600,000 and $700,000. While residing in Durham occurred an event, the result of which, through his great tenacity and his determination that right should prevail, has been of incalculable benefit to the inhabitants along the line traversed by this road. Soon after the erection of his residence and other buildings at Durham, the entire property was destroyed by fire from the cars. He applied to the president of the road for reasonable compensation for the damage sustained, but was met with the reply that not a dollar should be paid, as the corporation was in no way liable for damage sustained in that manner. The general promptly notified the officers of the road that unless the damages claimed were paid at once he should bring an action against the company to enforce his claim. Notwithstanding the act incorporating the road explicitly declared the corporation liable for such damage (the general himself was also one of the framers of this act) the demand was refused. The result may be stated in a few words. An action was immediately commenced, and after a four years' litigation with this wealthy corporation the court deecided the company liable for the damage, and the claim was paid. Thus to the invincible determination of Gen. Hoitt is due the construction of a law which has been invaluable to the citizens along this line. He demonstrated that the people had rights which the corporation was bound to respect, and long after the general shall have passed from the activity of this life that decree will remain upon the statute-book of this State as a monument to his characteristic determination for the right.

Gen. Hoitt was also fond of "ye military," and figured conspicuously in the old militia days. He rose from captain of an artillery company through the different grades to major-general, and was considered the best disciplinarian in the service. In political matters he has been from the first a worthy representative of the Jeffersonian type of Democracy. During his residence in the town of Lee he was chosen selectman by a unanimous vote of the town, and in 1881, although not having resided in Dover a year, he was nominated for mayor by the Democratic party, and came within one hundred and seven votes of defeating his opponent in a city of over one thousand Republican majority.

In referring to Gen. Hoitt's business career one fact stands out with hardly a parallel in history, that in all his business transactions, which have been and still are large, he never gave a note, except for the first piece of land purchased.

On Oct. 26, 1828, Gen. Hoitt united in marriage with Susan Demeritt, a native of Northwood, and their family consisted of thirteen children, twelve of whom survive. Mrs. Hoitt died in April, 1877. Jan. 6, 1879, he married Mrs. Mary A. Swart, a native of Boston, Mass.

Gen. Hoitt is essentially a self-made man. Early in life he learned that the way to success was by no royal road, but was open to stout hands and willing hearts. Energy and integrity, coupled with an indomitable will, have rendered his career a success, and the once poor boy is now one of the substantial and highly honored citizens of Strafford County.

1. John Sawyer, a farmer in Lincolnshire, England, had three sons, William, Edward, and Thomas, who emigrated to this country in 1636, being passengers in a ship commanded by Capt. Parker. They probably settled in Rowley, Mass.

2. Thomas Sawyer went to Lancaster, Mass., as early as 1647, when he was twenty-four years of age. This section of the Nashaway Valley, comprising eighty square miles in extent, had been purchased, in 1643, by Thomas King, of Watertown, Mass., of Scholan, sachem of the Nashaway Indians. Thomas Sawyer was one of the first six settlers. His name appears in the petition made to the General Court in 1633 for the incorporation of the town of Lancaster. In 1647, the year of his arrival, he married Mary Prescott. She was the daughter of John Prescott, to whom belongs the honor of being the first permanent inhabitant of Lancaster. The eminent historian, William H. Prescott, traces his ancestral line to this John Prescott. There were born to Thomas Sawyer and Mary Prescott eleven children. This family figures largely in that most tragic page of the history of Lancaster which tells of the massacres and captivities of its inhabitants, and the entire destruction of the town itself by the Indians. On the land of Thomas Sawyer stood the Sawyer garrison, into which were gathered the survivors of that most murderous attack made upon the town in the winter of 1675-76. At this time his second son, Ephraim, who was at the Prescott garrison, was killed by the Indians. Thirty-two years later, 1708, the oldest son, Thomas, and his son Elias were captured by the Indians and taken to Canada. When the party reached Montreal, the father offered to put up a mill on the river Chambly, on condition that the French governor would obtain the release of all the captives. Thus the first mill in Canada was built by Thomas Sawyer. He was liberated, but his son Elias was detained for a time to teach the Canadians "the art of sawing and keeping the mill in order, and then was dismissed with rich presents."

3. Caleb Sawyer, the sixth child of Thomas, was born in 1659, in Lancaster, Mass. He married Sarah Houghton, thus effecting an alliance between two of the most prominent families who organized the town of Lancaster. Caleb Sawyer died in 1755, leaving two sons and two daughters.

4. Seth Sawyer, the oldest son of Caleb, was born in 1705; married Miss Hepsabeth Whitney; died in 1768.

5. Caleb Sawyer, the second son of Seth, was born 1737, at Harvard, Mass., a part of Lancaster, which, in 1732, had been incorporated as a town by itself. He married Miss Sarah Patch, in 1766. They had two sons, Phineas and Jonathan. Jonathan remained on the home farm at Harvard, which is still occupied by his descendants.

6. Phineas Sawyer was born at Harvard, Mass., in 1768. He went to Marlborough, Mass., now Hudson, in 1800. He bought a mill property there, consisting of a saw, grist-, and wire-drawing-mill. In 1806 he built a cotton-mill, and operated it until the close of the war in 1815. It required in those days immense enterprise and energy to project and carry on such a work as a cotton-factory. The machinery was procured from Rhode Island. The ginning-machine had not yet come into general use. The cotton, when received, was distributed among the farmers, to have the seeds picked out one by one by their families. It was carded and spun by water-power at the mill. It was then sent out again among the farmers to be woven into cloth. Phineas Sawyer was a man of great independence of character, self-reliant and full of courage. These qualities, so conspicuous in his business affairs, shone out with undiminished power in his religious life. He lived at a time in Massachusetts when Methodism was regarded with special disfavor. But Mr. Sawyer, believing that the Methodists were right, believed so with all his heart, and the petty persecutions to which his faith was subjected only intensified his zeal and loyalty. His house was the home for all traveling Methodists, and the place where they gathered for religious worship. He was well versed in the best Methodist literature of his times. He stands forth in the annals of his church as one of the foremost men, for sagacity, boldness, and piety, in the Needham Circuit. He had for his wife a worthy helpmeet, Hannah Whitney, of Harvard. She was as ardently attached to Methodism as was her husband, and bore her full share of service and sacrifice for it in its days of weakness and persecution. The sudden death of her husband, which took place in 1820, left Mrs. Sawyer to provide for the support of twelve children, the youngest, Jonathan, being then two years old. This truly noble woman, with but little means, faced the difficulties before her with an unflinching spirit of faith and hopefulness. It required superlative fortitude, finest sagacity, and sternest self-sacrifice to have enabled this mother to successfully rear these twelve children, give to them a good education, and establish all of them in respectable positions in the world. She continued to live in Marlborough some nine years, leasing the mill property. In 1829 she went to Lowell, where she lived twenty years, dying there in 1849, greatly respected by all who knew her, and held in honor and affection by her many children.

7. Jonathan Sawyer, the subject of this sketch, was the youngest child of Phineas. He was born at Marlborough, Mass., in 1817. He went with his mother and other members of the family when he was twelve years old to Lowell, where for the next few years he attended school. He was a member of the first class that entered the high school of that city, having among his mates Hon. Benjamin F. Butler, Governor E. A. Straw, and G. V. Fox, assistant Secretary of the Navy during the civil war. Bishop Thomas M. Clark was the principal of this school. On account of a severe sickness, young Sawyer at sixteen years of age left school, and while recruiting his health made a visit to his brother, Alfred Ira Sawyer, who, after some experience as a dyer at Amesbury and Great Falls, had come in 1824 to Dover, N. H., where he was operating a grist-mill, a custom carding, and cloth-dressing mill, converting this last into a flannel-mill. Jonathan remained in Dover two years, going to school and working for his brother. In the fall of 1835 he returned to Lowell. His mother, for the purpose of conferring upon her son a more complete education, sent him to the great Methodist school at Willbraham, which at that time was a most flourishing preparatory school for the Wesleyan University at Middletown, Conn. Here he remained two terms, when, at nineteen years of age, returning to Lowell, he went into a woolen establishment as a dyer. Afterwards he went into this business on his own account, and continued in it until 1839.

During the latter part of this time he was not so engrossed in his business but that he found time to make frequent visits to New Ipswich, where Miss Martha Perkins, of Barnard, Vt., was attending school. In 1839 they were married, and went to Watertown, N. Y., where Mr. Sawyer became the superintendent of the Hamilton Woolen Company. After two and a half years Mr. Sawyer went into business for the manufacture of satinets. In 1850, his brother Alfred having died at Dover, N. H., the year before, and the children being too young to carry on the business, Mr. Jonathan Sawyer assumed its control in connection with his brother Zenas. Two years later Zenas retired, and Francis A. Sawyer, who had been a prominent builder in Boston, became a partner with Jonathan, the object being to continue the manufacture of woolen flannels. In 1858 the property below, known as the "Moses Mill," another flannel manufactory, was purchased. This mill was enlarged in 1860 to four sets of machinery, again in 1863 to eight, and in 1880 and 1882 to sixteen sets. The old machinery is now completely replaced by new. The old mill, started in 1832, was in 1872 replaced by the present substantial structure, which contains fourteen sets of machinery, with preparing and finishing machinery for thirty sets in both mills.

Since 1866 the attention of these noted manufacturers has been entirely devoted to the manufacture of fine fancy cassimere cloths and suitings. Already they have established for these goods a foremost place in their class. At the Centennial Exhibition, at Philadelphia, a medal and diploma were awarded the Sawyer goods for their "high intrinsic merit." The business has since 1873 been carried on as a corporation, having a capital of six hundred thousand dollars. The corporation consists of the old firm of F. A.<sup>1</sup> and J. Sawyer and Charles H. Sawyer, the present agent of the establishment. In 1866 this company made a bold innovation on the method that was so long in vogue among manufacturers of consigning their goods to commission houses. The undertaking upon which this company entered, of selling their own goods, was met with great opposition, but their boldness and foresight have already been justified by the success which they have made, and the adoption of their methods by other manufacturers. This establishment can now look back upon a half-century of remarkable history. The unmarred reputation for strictest integrity which these managers have won, their far-reaching enterprise, and the unsurpassed ex-cellences of their fabrics have enabled them to prosperously pass through all the financial depressions and panics which so many times have swept over the country during this long period.

Mr. Jonathan Sawyer, with his vigor of mind and body still unimpaired, lives in his elegant mansion, which looks out upon a magnificent picture of wood and vale and mountain range, and down upon the busy scene of his many years of tireless industry. He loves his home, in the adornment of which his fine taste finds full play. When free from business he is always there. He loves his books, and his conversation shows an unusual breath of reading in science, history, and politics. He is possessed of a strong, clear intellect, a calm, dispassionate judgment, and sympathies which always bring him to the side of the wronged and the suffering. At a time when anti-slavery sentiments were unpopular Mr. Sawyer was free in their utterance, and was among the first to form the Free-Soil party. Since the organization of the Republican party Mr. Sawyer has been among its strongest supporters. He has persistently declined the many offices of honor and profit which those acquainted with his large intelligence and sagacity and stainless honesty have sought to confer upon him. He is abundantly content to exercise his business powers in developing still more the great manufactory, and his affections upon his large household and his chosen friends, and his public spirit in helping every worthy cause and person in the community.

The children of Mr. Sawyer, all of whom have grown up to maturity, are Charles Henry, Mary Elizabeth, Francis Asbury, Roswell Douglas, Martha Frances, Alice May, Frederic Jonathan.

COL. CHARLES H. SAWYER.<sup>2</sup>

Charles Henry is the eldest son of Jonathan Sawyer, the sketch of whose life precedes this. He was born March 30, 1840, at Watertown, N. Y. At ten years of age, on the removal of his father to Dover, N. H., Charles, who had<sup>1</sup> already become quite advanced in his studies, was sent to the district school in that place. The district school, although it has been supplanted by what is regarded as an improved system of education, had its own distinctive merits. The six years' training in it, under competent teachers, was sufficient to give young Sawyer a thoroughly practical education in those branches which are found to be essential to success in business life. Books can do little more than this. Experience must complete the training process. At sixteen years of age, it being determined that Charles was to enter into the business of his father, he was placed as an apprentice in the Sawyers' woolen-mills. The business to which a young man is to devote his life affords the very best means for his education in it. It proved to be so in this instance. The young apprentice, as he progressed from one stage to another, had the finest of opportunities for acquiring a full knowledge of all the diversified interests and sciences which belong to such a great industry. There is scarcely a branch in natural philosophy, physics, or the mechanical arts that is not intimately connected with the manufacture of woollens. But the manufacturing processes embrace only a part of the activities and requirements of such a business as the Sawyers'. They are their own buyers and sellers in all the great markets of our own and other lands. Superadded to mechanical knowledge and skill, there must be the large intelligence, the clear foresight, the quick, unerring judgment which belong to the accomplished financier. In this manufactory, based upon so varied knowledge, and calling into activity so many of the strong mental powers, Charles found a grand school, and such proficiency did he make in it that when he came to his manhood he was abundantly qualified to take upon himself the duties and responsibilities of superintendent. He was appointed to this position in 1866. No small share of the distinguished success which has come to this establishment may be fairly attributable to the fidelity and perseverance in service, the keen sagacity and the great enterprise which Charles H. Sawyer has brought to its every interest. In 1875, when the company became incorporated, he was admitted to the firm, and at the same time was appointed its agent and one of the directors. Since then he has been elected its president.

Mr. Sawyer has served in both branches of the Dover city government, was a member of the New Hampshire Legislature in 1869 and 1870, and again in 1876 and 1877, serving on the committees on railroads, incorporations, judiciary, national affairs, and as chairman of the committee on manufactures. In 1881 he was appointed by Governor Bell a member of his military staff, with rank of colonel. Mr. Sawyer is now acting as director of the Stratford National Bank and the Portsmouth and Dover Railroad, and trustee of the Stratford Savings-Bank. He is a member of the Masonic order, taking a personal interest in all that concerns its prosperity. In 1867 he became a member of the Stratford Lodge, and was Master in 1872 and 1873. He is a member of the St. Paul Commandery of Knights Templar, of which he has just been elected Eminent Commander for the fourth time.

Mr. Sawyer, in 1865, was married to Susan Ellen Cowan, daughter of Dr. James W. and Elizabeth Cowan.

Mr. Sawyer is not only a man of affairs, taking a deep personal interest in the various movements of politics, finance, and industrial life, but he is a man of large reading, and is well acquainted with the best books and thoughts of the times. His judgments of men and measures are singularly free from partiality and prejudice. His conclusions are deliberately formed, and based upon a broad comprehension of all the related facts. His sense of justice is strong, his intellectual qualities are admirably balanced. He never is otherwise than perfectly poised. With all this, he has the warmest heart, the quickest sympathies, great kindness of manner, and utmost geniality of spirit. In the reserve of his nature he withholds himself from all impetuous demonstrations, but when the occasion demands, his influence, his advice, his friendship are put forth with commanding effect. Nature made him on a large scale, and books and experience and increasing converse with the best phases of social life are developing him into rare strength and symmetry of character.

ANDREW PEIRCE.

Andrew Peirce was born in Dover, N. H., July 31, 1814. (He was formerly called Andrew Peirce 3d.)

His paternal grandfather was born in Dover in 1761, and early in life moved to Gloucester, Mass., where he purchased lands in 1792, and in 1806 sold them and removed with his family back to Dover. He was a descendant in the sixth generation of "John Pers," of Norwich, Norfolk County, England, who emigrated to this country in 1637, and settled in Watertown, Mass.

His father was born in Gloucester in 1792, but after 1806 was a resident of Dover during the remainder of his life. He was engaged in navigation at a time when Dover was quite a distributing-point for the interior country. In about the year 1825 he built two schooners of about sixty-five tons each to run between Dover and Boston, one named "Dover Packet," and the other "Boston Packet." He commanded one and his brother-in-law, James Wentworth, the other. These schooners were built on his grounds near his house, located on Dover turnpike, and were hauled on trucks built for that purpose to Dover Landing and launched into the river. He was also interested in constructing the steam-mill at Dover; an owner in it, and one of its managers.

He was elected State senator, and held other offices of trust and honor; he was a man of sound practical judgment and remarkable energy of character; he pursued what he deemed to be right with firmness and perseverance, and was respected and honored by all who knew him. His moral character was beyond reproach; his benevolence to those in distress was not exceeded by any one of the same means.

His mother was Betsey Wentworth, born in 1791. Her paternal grandfather was Col. Jonathan Wentworth, an officer in the Revolutionary war; he was captain in Col. Poor's regiment, and also under Washington; he was major under Col. Thomas Bartlett, and brigade-major under Col. Stephen Evans; he was a member of the New Hampshire Legislature for three years, and colonel of the Second New Hampshire Regiment in 1789; he was a descendant in the fourth generation of Elder William Wentworth, who probably came to this country with or about the time of Rev. John Wheelwright from near Alford, England; he was one of the signers of thirty-five persons to a combination for government at Exeter, N. H., July 4, 1637; the original document is preserved among the records of Exeter. He removed to Dover in 1650, and lived at or near there, save on temporary absence, during his life. The office by which he was best known was that of ruling elder, which he held for forty years.

"His mother was endowed largely by nature with the varied gifts which combine the excellences of the character of woman. She moved in the circle of home, in the neighborhood, and through the range of her acquaintance in a mission of sympathy and benevolence which was never weary in well-doing."

At the age of twelve the subject of this sketch was employed as clerk in the store of Mr. Ira Christie in his native town, where he remained about two years, and then left to attend the Strafford Academy. Soon after he entered the store of Robert H. Palmer as clerk, on a salary at the rate of one hundred dollars per year, where he remained about six months, and then again entered the academy, and employed his leisure hours in collecting his father's freight-bills. His tastes and capacity for business developed and continued to increase, and soon he began to feel very desirous of engaging in business himself. When he was sixteen years of age he went with his father to Boston in one of his vessels, where he purchased a small stock of goods on four months' credit, his father being held responsible for the payment.

He commenced business April 22, 1834, in Dover, in what was then known as the White Building. He remained in that place about two years, when he needed more room, as the increase of business demanded; then he moved to one of the Watson stores on Dover Landing.

He was very successful, and before the age of twenty had a credit second to none in the State. He had quite a large wholesale, as well as retail, trade, which extended to the northern part of New Hampshire and Vermont and along the western border of Maine.

He was married to Rebecca W. Dunaway, of Gloucester, Mass., April 11, 1834. Up to and about this time, though the business had been transacted in the name of his father, he had the sole control; he took account of stock in his twentieth year, determined the profits from the commencement of the business, and gave his father one-half; then he started in his own name, adding a greater variety to the stock to meet the demands of country trade.

In about 1837 he felt the necessity of still more room, and Mr. Enoch H. Nutter united with him in building a brick store on Dover Landing opposite the Watson store, into which he moved about the year 1838, when his father became associated with him for about two years, and then withdrew, and his brother

Thomas was received as a partner, and continued for about two years, when he received his share of the profits and went to Boston to engage in business for himself. His father then resumed his connection with him.

Beside the above-named partners, Mr. Peirce had at different times Thomas L. Smith, Thomas Stackpole, and his brother George, all of whom were paid their proportion of the profits when they ceased their connection with him. No real capital was placed in the business by any of the partners, except that which was made while with him.

He was also interested with his father in shipping during his business career in Dover. They sent vessels to Thomaston, Me., to New York, Philadelphia, and to some Southern ports. They might be called pioneers in the Texas trade, as they had vessels which plied between New York and Texas ports before the annexation of that State. They sent a vessel drawing a light draught of water, which was said to be the first sailing craft that ever entered Houston Harbor to lighter cotton and merchandise between Houston and Galveston.

They engaged the ship-builder, Mr. John Savill, to build the schooner "Charles Henry," named for Mr. Peirce's son.

They also built at Philadelphia a small centre-board brig of one hundred and thirty-five tons, named "Ellen and Clara," for his two daughters. This brig was under charter to the government during the Mexican war, and was wrecked near Vera Cruz during a severe gale of wind; he was also interested in the steam-mill at Dover; he bought, repaired, and enlarged the Rogers wharf and buildings on Cochecho River, which were used for the landing and storage of their goods; he also built several houses, remodeled and enlarged the Bridge House, which he bought of the Cochecho Manufacturing Company, in which he was living at the time he went to Boston.

Mr. Peirce's extensive business brought him in contact with most of the leading business men of Strafford County, and indeed throughout the State, and his reputation for integrity, his independent and self-reliant character, his truthfulness and candor, never thinking or caring what any one thought or said of him, conscious he was doing what he felt to be right, gave him an influence in his party which few had.

He was a Democrat; though active, he never had any desire to hold any political office, as his life was too full of busy cares to permit him to enter the political arena. There was hardly a Strafford County or State Democratic Convention held in New Hampshire which, while he was there, he did not attend. He was once elected delegate to and attended the Democratic National Convention held in Baltimore.

In 1845, Mr. Peirce put forth his energies to organize the Dover Bank under the individual liability act, which was to take the place of the old Dover Bank, whose charter was about to expire. With earnest efforts to accomplish this he succeeded. His father and himself subscribed about one-fifth of the capital stock. A few years later, feeling the necessity for increased banking facilities, he procured a charter and organized the Langdon Bank, subscribing to its stock, and was elected president of it. In connection with the Langdon Bank he also organized a Five-Cent Savings-Bank. He was the leading manager of these banks during his residence in Dover, and for some years after going to Boston.

Mr. Peirce was one of the large stockholders of the Cochecho Railroad Company, and also one of the active managers in the construction of the road. During its financial embarrassment he aided the company by indorsing their notes to a large amount.

After the road was completed and open for business he had entire charge of the operating department for several years. He took an active part in leasing the road to the Boston and Maine Railroad Company. He was a stockholder and one of the promoters of the steamer "Dover," which was run on Winnipisseege Lake, in connection with the Cochecho Railroad.

He went to Boston Jan. 1, 1852, and connected himself with the firm of Peirce & Bacon, the members of which were his brother, Thomas W. Peirce, and George Bacon; they were large wholesale grocers, and in connection with that business received Southern produce on commission, consisting of cotton, sugar, hides, &c. Very soon the Southern business had increased so much that they decided to discontinue the grocery business, and confine themselves entirely to the commission business, which was principally with Texas, though they had extensive relations with other parts of the South; probably their receipts of cotton, &c., were not exceeded by any Northern house.

They purchased and built eleven or twelve brigs and barks, which ran between Boston and Galveston, and at times chartered many others. They were also large owners in two large ships, which sailed to foreign ports.

They were early identified with the internal improvements of Texas, and subscribed to its first railway, furnishing the iron therefor.

In about 1854 they commenced to export largely of cotton to Liverpool, both from Boston and directly from Galveston. This they continued to do until 1861, the commencement of the war, when their business was entirely suspended in consequence of the war, and all the vessels hitherto going South had to be laid up at the wharves in Boston.

They lost a very large amount of the debts due them at the South, but these losses were not enough to embarrass them in their financial affairs. One of their vessels was seized and sunk in Galveston Harbor.

Business was generally so paralyzed that most of their vessels remained at the wharves a year or more before there was any demand for their use. They had several thousand bales of cotton on hand in Boston and Liverpool, which they sold within a few months after the war began. After this, though they retained their offices, they had little or no business, except to manage their vessels, dealing in merchandise of different kinds to employ a portion of their time.

After the close of the war they resumed business again with Texas, and continued about a year, when they dissolved partnership, and Mr. George Bacon removed to New York, and started a similar business there.

At one time he was elected, without being consulted, as a reform director of the Boston and Maine Railroad, and introduced many of the reforms that were carried into effect that year in reducing the operating expenses of the road.

Just before the next election of the stockholders of the company a committee of the largest stockholders—as follows: Hon. William Appleton and William Sturgis, of Boston, John Aiken, of Andover, and one of the former presidents—invited him to take the presidency of the road, but his business would not permit him to do it. In 1857 he purchased a house on the corner of Beacon and Mount Vernon Streets, where he resided for about ten years.

On June 6, 1861, he was married, the second time, to Mary Francis Gilman, of Nashua, N. H.

He was very active in procuring the charter of the Dover and Portsmouth Railroad, encountering great opposition from the railroad interests of that part of the State; and being opposed by the Governor, he spent the whole time during the session of the Legislature in Concord. When the bill was passed by both houses, the victory was considered a remarkable success.

At the earnest solicitation of many of his friends he left Boston in 1868, and went to Missouri to take charge of the construction and operating department of the South Pacific and Atlantic and Pacific Railroads.

He was a large stockholder in these roads, and was elected a director, and chosen by the directors general manager of the property in Missouri. At this time eighty-nine miles of the road had been built and were in operation from Pacific City, Mo., westward to the town of Arlington, situated on the Gasconade River. From this point to Vinita, Indian Territory, a distance of about two hundred and forty-two miles, the road was constructed and fully equipped under his direction and supervision.

Their trains went into St. Louis over the Missouri Pacific Railroad from Pacific City, a distance of thirty-seven miles. He saw the necessity of his roads controlling this road, and in 1870 or 1871 he arranged for himself and his friends to purchase a majority of its stock that they might control its management.

At about this time the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company arranged for the purchase and consolidation of the South Pacific Railroad with the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad, after which the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad leased the Missouri Pacific Railroad for ninety-nine years. This gave Mr. Peirce about nine-hundred miles of railroad in Missouri and Kansas under his entire control.

Upon the completion of the construction and equipment of the Atlantic and Pacific and the South Pacific Roads, it was found that in consequence of the low price at which the bonds of the road had been sold by its early financial manager there was left upon the company a large floating debt. This debt was largely increased by the floating debt of the Missouri Pacific Railroad, which made a large sum to carry as a floating debt. In 1872 the financial affairs of the company were so difficult to manage, the directors desired him to take the presidency of the company, and also to continue to act as the general manager. He removed to New York, in order to manage the financial affairs of the company, and also retained his offices in St. Louis. After he moved to New York, in 1872, the condition of the finances of the country made it impossible to sell bonds to reduce the floating debt of the company, consequently he found it a difficult and laborious task to carry it, but succeeded in doing so by his personal indorsements of the notes of the company until about the 1st of November, 1875.

The unprecedented panic of 1873 increased his difficulties in carrying the large debt, but yet he was able to continue doing so till the fall of 1875. That year was the great grasshopper year in Missouri and Kansas. The terrible destruction of the crops in these States in consequence caused a reduction in the receipts of the road of about eight hundred thousand dollars. After this he was compelled to surrender, and the roads were placed in the hands of receivers about Nov. 1, 1875. They owed a floating debt of about two million five hundred thousand dollars, on which he was indorser for over one million five hundred thousand dollars.

Notwithstanding all kinds of opposition, the court early in September, 1876, ordered the sale of roads to take place early in the following November, making about a year that the roads were in the hands of the court. During this time a large majority of the floating liabilities were paid, and those which had not been paid at that time were paid soon after the roads were reorganized. Mr. Peirce was continued as president and general manager of the roads while they were in the hands of the receiver. His indorsements for this company from 1872 to 1875 amounted to over ten million dollars. While the previous financial manager paid from ten to thirteen and eighteen per cent. to carry their loans, he paid from seven to ten per cent., and not over eight per cent on an average per annum, thus saving vast sums of money. He had also been president of the Beaver Branch Railroad.

After the roads were sold, the Missouri Pacific was reorganized under its old name, and Commodore C. K. Garrison was made its president. He was an owner of one-half of its stock or more.

The Atlantic and Pacific was reorganized under the name of the St. Louis and San Francisco Railway Company. Mr. Peirce was elected its president and general manager, and conceived its plan of reorganization, in which it was provided that every old stockholder of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad should, upon surrendering his certificate of stock to the new company, receive the same number of shares of the stock of that company that were held in the old company. This was considered quite a novel plan of reorganization of a railroad, as the custom has been for the bondholders to take possession of the property, the stockholders losing their stock. Mr. Peirce encountered much opposition in carrying out this point, but was determined and unyielding, and thus succeeded in doing so.

During his connection with the road it was surveyed and located from Vinita, the present terminal point, to San Francisco, and would have been constructed but for the unprecedented financial condition of the country from 1872 to 1877, which made it impossible to sell large amounts of railroad bonds, which in this case was necessary for the construction of the road.

An association of gentlemen organized a town on the line of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad, three hundred miles west of St. Louis, and gave it the name of Peirce City. It is one of the most flourishing of the towns in Southwest Missouri. It very early had a large brick school-house, which cost nearly twenty thousand dollars; and there is a college called "Peirce City Baptist College," to which Mr. Peirce has extended a helping hand.

While connected with the road it was Mr. Peirce's policy to encourage building school-houses and churches, and in all cases lands of the company were donated for them, and building material transported free or at a mere nominal price. Quite a large donation of valuable land was made to the college at Springfield, Mo., which institution is now a large and prosperous one.

Mr. Peirce is a stock and bondholder in his brother's road in Texas, the Galveston, Houston and San Antonio, and was one of the directors for several years.

He has been able to meet every financial liability and fulfill all his obligations in the severe crises through which the country has passed, from the one in 1837 to the present time.

He was potent and deliberate in maturing and developing his plans, which were always independently conceived, but vigorous and active in their execution; with a natural bent for the management of great enterprises, he was never neglectful of the smallest details.

His charities have been unostentatious but well directed, not always flowing in the regular channels, but very many can testify to the aid and encouragement given to young men who have found him an invaluable friend, and the unasked-for assistance given through all his life to the sick, suffering, and unfortunate, and to his responses to public calls for relief and aid to benevolent institutions.

In locating the Atlantic and Pacific Road, and during its construction, he rode on horseback and walked over every foot of the line from Gasconade River to Vinita, I. T., many times. The country was sparsely settled, and most of its inhabitants lived in log cabins containing but one room, consequently his resting-places were in these cabins, where he almost always met with hospitality.

Mr. Peirce retained his office as president and general manager of the St. Louis and San Francisco Road until the autumn of 1877, when, feeling symptoms of failing health, and the necessity of seeking the quiet pleasures of a private life, he resigned his office, for the strain of several of the preceding years, added to the unremitting and diligent attention to business for about fifty years, had been very great.

He went to Clifton Springs, N. Y., where he had previously taken his family on account of his wife's ill health. There he found the quiet, regular life restful and pleasant. The relief from business cares was unspeakable. He enjoyed the country air and scenes and the fine drives in this section of beautiful country.

With the excellent advice and patient perseverance in the well-directed treatment of Dr. Foster he has recovered his health, and feels deep and heartfelt gratitude to him and the institution which has been such a blessing to himself and his wife.

Seeing the doctor in his daily ministrations, he has admired his truly noble and unselfish character, and his life consecrated wholly to a grand work for suffering humanity.

Very lucrative positions have been offered Mr. Peirce, but he has not felt disposed to enter again upon the cares and turmoils of business life, as he has no desire to accumulate large sums of money, but rather to spend the remaining years in the enjoyment of the fruits of his labors.

A friend, in speaking of Mr. Peirce and the Sanitarium, says,—

"Perhaps the severest test of strength and equanimity of character in the life of a business man comes at the point of retirement from active participation in those schemes and enterprises which have for years absorbed him. This point of Mr. Peirce's history gives the final proof that his early plans were so wisely laid as to cover his whole life, making provision for useful activity in later years. With him the westerling sun of a long, well-employed working-day finds him without misanthropy or discontent, never happier in his life, with fullness of strength, busily occupied in the most beautiful work of his life.

"Dr. Henry Foster is, like himself, of New England stock, beginning life with no capital but an inheritance of honesty, probity, and faithfulness, and has, with God's blessing upon years of patient, enduring, unselfish toil, achieved eminence not often attained in the medical profession.

"The doctor had reached the point in his life when the plans of years were taking their final shape, when the Sanitarium which he had founded, having grown from simple beginnings to represent invested capital of three hundred and fifty thousand dollars, with a medical staff of six physicians, with full complement of nurses and employes, embracing in its resources for healing almost all that is known to medical science, with its grand records of the past, its present prosperity was to be transferred by him to the care of trustees, that after his lifetime and in all the future the institution might remain a permanent blessing to suffering humanity. Just at this crisis a beneficent Providence orders the way of Mr. Peirce to Clifton Springs.

"It is not strange that the wise, far seeing financier, whose heart success has always opened to bestow of his abundance to relieve the suffering, should enter with deep sympathy into the plans and works of the great-hearted physician. In accordance with Dr. Foster's long-cherished plans, the Sanitarium was given in trust to a board of trustees composed of the following-named gentlemen: Right Rev. Matthew Simpson, D.D., Right Rev. Arthur Cleveland Coxe, D.D., Rev. N. G. Clark, D.D., Rev. John M. Reid, D.D., Rev. J. N. Murdoch, D.D., Rev. Frank E. Ellenwood, D.D., Rev. John M. Ferris, D.D., Rev. John Colton Smith, D.D., Rev. Martin B. Anderson, D.D., Rev. James B. Shaw, D.D., Judge James C. Smith, Andrew Peirce, Rev. George Loomis, D.D., William Foster.

"As trustee and chairman of the executive committee, to whom are committed such important trusts, Mr. Peirce by his invaluable counsels and active direction is making large and safe investments in a business, namely, the relieving and uplifting of humanity, which must pay ample dividends of satisfaction and happiness now, and will yield rich returns of blessing to those who survive him.

"Unaccustomed to idle leisure, with returning health Mr. Peirce entered upon improving and beautifying the extensive grounds of the Sanitarium, freely giving his time and personal supervision to the work, thus adding greatly to the attractiveness of the place by filling up and grading acres of the grounds. The spacious and elegant pavilion bearing his name, which covers the mineral springs, inviting the sick and weary to a delightful resting-place, a beautiful band-stand and a tasteful summer-house in the grounds, accessible to all, educating and refining by their beauty and gladdening by their comfort the lowliest and highest alike, are all his munificent gifts.

"The following resolution, unanimously adopted at a recent meeting of the board of trustees of the Clifton Springs Sanitarium Company, indicates their appreciation of the gifts and services of Mr. Peirce, so freely and heartily rendered:

"The trustees of the Clifton Springs Sanitarium Company desire to put on record their high appreciation of the very valuable services rendered to the Sanitarium by Mr. Andrew Peirce during the last two years, by his generous donation of upwards of fifteen thousand dollars, and by his careful supervision, good taste, and strict economy in expenditures for repairs and improvements in and on the buildings and grounds of the institution."

"When Dr. and Mrs. Foster gave the commodious building to the Young Men's Christian Association, Mr. Peirce, true to his New England instincts, caring for the education of the people through good books, endowed the library it contains so liberally that, against his protest, it bears his name.

"While tenderly and hopefully watching his wife's restoration to health,—she is the active sympathizer in all his benevolences,—he is identified with plans which embody the wisdom of two marked men, his own and Dr. Foster's.

"Mr. Peirce, in retiring from the business circles where he was so well known, has come into a sphere of usefulness whose extent is not easily computed, and among a people who bless the day he found a home with them.

"In these rich, ripe years of his life he has developed only more fully the strength and texture of his father's character in the firm and skillful execution of wise plans, and the gentle blood of his mother in his unostentatious kindness and liberality.

"Verging on that limit of human life when the past is reviewed, Mr. Peirce has cause for gratitude that in the years of intense application to business he has so well used the influence God has given him to induce men by his example to love their race and their country and to strive to promote the welfare of the world.

"The question of business now removed, his thought and skill and time are being daily devoted to comfort, help, and relieve all who come in contact with him who from any cause suffer. As a result of such unselfish caring for others, Mr. Peirce has been brought into closer sympathy with the mission of the blessed Redeemer to the suffering race of man."

The record of Andrew Peirce is an honor to his native town and county, and his present happy life of good deeds a blessing to our common humanity.

THOMAS WENTWORTH PEIRCE.

Thomas Wentworth Peirce, a prominent man in the mercantile world, alike honored for his successful business enterprises and for honorable private qualities, was born at Dover, N. H., Aug. 16, 1818, being the second of the notable sons of the Hon. Andrew Peirce and of his wife, Mrs. Betsey Peirce, a descendant of Governor Wentworth. Commencing his mercantile career when a mere youth, he displayed by his energy and strict integrity and zealous observance of duty those high and impressive qualities which in early manhood had secured for him an enviable position in the business world, and which assured in the broader fields of activity and usefulness which were to be opened before him in later years all the success he has achieved.

In his sixteenth year Mr. Peirce became interested in his father's business, buying and loading and dispatching vessels, opening new channels of domestic commerce, and proving himself by his singular maturity and wisdom fully worthy of his father's unbounded confidence. It was but a year or two later that he was appointed on the staff of the Governor of New Hampshire, a fact which shows how even at that early age his force of character was publicly appreciated. At about the same time he formed a business connection with his brother Andrew, then president of the Dover Bank, and now well known for his part in the large railroad matters of the Southwest. But after six years, seeing the opportunities afforded by a wider field, he established a house in Boston, under the firm-name of Peirce & Bacon, of which his brother Andrew subsequently became a member, and whose business in cotton and other Southern products grew to such an extent that it required a partner in Texas, and employed a line of fifteen packet-ships.

In his earlier years Mr. Peirce's health had been delicate, and he had been sent to the South by his father, and had then visited Texas. It is not to be supposed that by an eye so keen and a mind so alert the vast possibilities of that almost unexplored country should remain unobserved. It may literally be said that, beginning with a period in her history antedating by a number of years the admission of Texas to the Union, Mr. Peirce grew with her growth, shaping his enterprises to meet the demands and improve the opportunities afforded by the imperial march of her progress and development. He has thus been identified with almost every work of internal improvement within her borders, thereby expanding her commercial and industrial interests, of which he has been a principal factor both in Europe and America, to this end having built her first hundred miles of railroad, as he has since lived to be chiefly instrumental in the completion of a great transcontinental line connecting her sea-coast with the Mexican border and the Pacific Ocean. By the line last mentioned it is expected that the cereal and other products of California, Arizona, and New Mexico, as well as of Western Texas, will find shipment upon the waters of the Gulf of Mexico, thus working a great economy of time and distance in our European exchanges, and facilitating commerce to that extent. Supplementing this enterprise, great lines of steamships are in process of establishment for the carriage of the freights referred to, and by which, on their return voyage to New Orleans and Galveston, the emigrating populations of the Old World are to be borne to their new homes in the fertile regions west of the Mississippi and upon the Pacific slope at almost nominal rates. Relying upon his individual efforts for the completion of his work, and that too at times of great financial depression, it is but the truth to say that so great an enterprise has rarely been undertaken by any single American citizen, and least of all carried through to a successful consummation. The grand results which it is to secure will be witnessed for years after he shall have ceased to participate in its administration, in that thrifty progress, the multiplication of towns and cities, and the expanding area of cultivation and education everywhere visible in the section traversed by the lines of communication established through his agency.

Mr. Peirce has not been negligent of the responsibilities attaching to the control of such great material interests, as his liberal donations for the establishment, in the new communities thus brought into existence, of many institutions of education and religion may testify, and he may feel himself well repaid for his years of toil and anxiety by the spectacle daily presented to him in the scenes of individual and social happiness which he has contributed so much to create.

To nothing else more than to the influences exerted by Mr. Peirce, in the enterprises with which he has been connected, are the amicable relations now existing between Mexico and the United States to be attributed, an international felicity which is to be further guaranteed by the projection of the railway system under his auspices and those of his associates, the work now being in progress to the capital of the Mexican republic.

Mr. Peirce makes his home in Top-field, Mass., having his offices in Boston, New York, and San Antonio, finding in the congenial employments of agriculture, in the love of domestic life, and in the delights of hospitality all the enjoyments that are the deserts of a well-spent life. He has been twice married, his first wife having been Miss Mary Curtis, of Boston, and his second wife, Miss Catherine Cornelia Cook, of Cooperstown, N. Y. The latter wife left him a son and daughter to inherit his ample fortune and his great qualities of mind and heart.

Famous as the small farming towns of New Hampshire have been in producing men eminent in the learned profession, they have not been less prolific in furnishing young men who have achieved distinction and borne great sway in what are recognized as the more practical business pursuits. Inventors, constructors, skilled artisans, the men who have taken the lead in developing our manufacturing interests and bringing toward perfection intricate processes, those who have increased the volume of trade at home and abroad, and have become merchant princes, have come, as a rule, from the plain farm-houses and common schools of our thousand hillsides. The stern virtues, the rigid frugality, and the mullagging industry always insisted on in the home-life, supplemented by the limited but intensely practical learning gained in the district school, have furnished successive generations of young men, compact, firm, and robust in their whole make-up, strong of body, clear and vigorous of mind, the whole impress and mould of their moral natures in harmony with right-doing. These men have been a permeating force for good through all classes of our population, and towers of strength in our national life. The life of the subject of this sketch is a well-rounded example of such young men.

Zimri Scates Wallingford, the son of Samuel and Sallie (Wooster) Wallingford, was born in Milton, in the county of Strafford, Oct. 7, 1816.

Nicholas Wallington, who came when a boy in the ship "Confidence," of London, to Boston, in the year 1638, settled in Newbury, Mass., where he married, Aug. 30, 1654, Sarah, daughter of Henry and Bridget Travis, who was born in 1636. He was captured on a sea voyage and never returned, and his estate was settled in 1684. With his children (of whom he had eight) the surname became Wallingford.

John Wallingford, son of the emigrant Nicholas, was born in 1659; married Mary, daughter of Judge John and Mary Tuttle, of Dover, N. H.; but he lived in that part of Rowley, Mass., now known as Bradford. He had seven children; one of these was Hon. Thomas Wallingford, of that part of ancient Dover afterwards Somersworth, and now known as Rollinsford, who was one of the wealthiest and most eminent men of the province, associate justice of the Supreme Court from 1748 until his death, which took place at Portsmouth, Aug. 4, 1771. The eldest son of John Wallingford, and grandson of the emigrant, was John Wallingford, born Dec. 14, 1688, settled in Rochester, N. H., and became an extensive land-owner. His will, dated Oct. 7, 1761, was proved Jan. 17, 1762. His son, Peter Wallingford, who inherited the homestead and other land in Rochester (then including Milton), made his will April 18, 1771, which was proved Aug. 24, 1773. His son, David Wallingford, settled upon the lands in Milton, then a wilderness. He died in 1815, being the father of Samuel Wallingford, who was father of Zimri S.

Upon his mother's side Mr. Wallingford is descended from Rev. William Worcester, the first minister of the church in Salisbury, Mass., and ancestor of the eminent New England family of that name or its equivalent, Wooster. Lydia Wooster, great-aunt of Mr. Wallingford, was the wife of Gen. John Sullivan, of Durham, major-general in the army of the Revolution, and the first Governor of the State of New Hampshire. She was mother of Hon. George Sullivan, of Exeter, who was attorney-general of this State for thirty years.

In 1825 the father of Mr. Wallingford died, leaving his widow with four children, of which this son, then nine years of age, was the eldest. At the age of twelve he commenced learning the trade of a country blacksmith. When he had wrought for his master as his boyish strength would allow for two years, he determined not to be content with being simply a blacksmith, and entered the machine-shop of the Great Falls Manufacturing Company, at Great Falls, N. H., and served a full apprenticeship at machine-building there, in Maryland, Virginia, and in the city of Philadelphia.

Aug. 27, 1840, Mr. Wallingford married Alta L. G. Hilliard, daughter of Rev. Joseph Hilliard, pastor of the Congregational Church in Berwick, Me., from 1796 to 1827. Their children have been (1) John O. Wallingford, who was sergeant-major, and became lieutenant in the Fifteenth New Hampshire Volunteers in the war of the Rebellion; was severely wounded in the assault on Port Hudson, and was afterwards captain in the Eighteenth New Hampshire, an officer of great merit, whose death at his home in Dover, March 23, 1872, was the result of disease contracted in his war service; (2) Mary C., now wife of Sidney A. Phillips, Esq., counselor-at-law in Framingham, Mass.; (3) Julia, residing with her parents.

In 1844, Mr. Wallingford entered the employ of the Cochecho Manufacturing Company, Dover, N. H., as master machine-builder, and remained in that capacity until 1849. During that period Mr. Wallingford and a partner, by contract, constructed new machinery, cards, looms, dressing-frames, and nearly everything necessary for the re-equipment of the mills. The then new and large mill at Salmon Falls was also supplied with the new machinery necessary in the same manner.

In 1849 he became superintendent of the company's mills, under the then agent, Capt. Moses Paul, and upon the death of that gentleman was, on the 1st day of August, 1860, appointed agent of the company. He has continued to fill that office to the present time. Taking into account the great social and public influence, as well as the recognized ability with which his predecessor had for many years administered the affairs of the Cochecho Company, the magnitude of its operations, the force and grasp of mind necessary to carry on its affairs successfully, it was evident to all familiar with the situation upon the death of Capt. Paul that no ordinary man could occupy the place with credit to himself, or to the respect of the public, or the satisfaction of the corporation.

Fully conscious of the responsibility assumed, and full of the determination which an ardent nature is capable of, not only to maintain the reputation of his company, but to extend its operations and raise the standard of its manufactured goods, it is not overstating the fact to say that in the last twenty years few manufacturing companies have made greater strides in the extent of their works, in the quality of their goods, or their reputation in the great markets than has the Cochecho under the management of Mr. Wallingford. Always strong financially, its wheels have never during that time been idle in any season of panic or monetary depression. Honorable and ever generous to all its employé's, its machinery has never stopped for a day at the demand of any organized strike. The pride as well as the main business interest of Dover, Mr. Wallingford has always made his company popular with the people; its word proverbially is as good as its bond. The importance of the work is seen in the fact that the mills were, when Mr. Wallingford took charge, of a so-called capacity of fifty-seven thousand spindles; it is now one hundred and twenty thousand; and the reputation of the goods is world-wide. Twelve hundred operatives are on the books of his charge.

To a stranger to the home-life of Dover these results seem the great life-work of Mr. Wallingford; but such an one, in making up his estimate, will fail to do justice to some of the elements of character which have, by skillful adaptation, contributed to so great success. To one so observing, the marked traits of the individual are lost sight of in the results of his career. To those only who are personally familiar with the individual are the real elements of success apparent. Of course, without the strong common sense and good judgment which we sum up as "business sagacity," Mr. Wallingford's successes would have been failures; but to one familiar with his daily life for a score of years, it is apparent that the crowning excellence of his life, and the power which has supplemented his mental force and rounded out his life, have been his stern moral sense.

Perhaps the most noticeable trait in his character from childhood has been his love of justice and right, and his hatred of wrong and injustice in all its forms. Under such a man no employé, no matter how humble his position, could be deprived of his just consideration; no interest of his corporation could be allowed to ask from the public authorities any indulgence or advantage not fairly to be accorded to the smallest tax-payer. Had he gone no further than to insist on this exact counterpoise of right and interest, as between employer and employé, and between the interest represented by him and the public interest, his course would have stood out in marked contrast with the conduct of too many clothed with the brief authority of corporate power. Had this strict observance of the relative rights of all concerned been as nicely regarded by associated capital generally as it has been by the Cochecho Company under the management of Mr. Wallingford and his lamented predecessor, no "brotherhood" for the protection of labor, no "strikes" organized and pushed to bring too exacting employers to their senses and to an observance of the common rights of humanity would have had an existence, and none would have had occasion to view with jealous eye the apprehended encroachment of corporate power on private right. But while so insisting on justice in everything, no man has a kinder vein of character, or a warmer sympathy for deserving objects of charity. Impulsive naturally, no distressed individual or deserving cause appeals to him in vain, or long awaits the open hand of a cheerful giver.

To a man so endowed by nature, so grounded in right principles, and so delighting in the exercise of a warm, Christian charity, we may naturally expect the result that we see in this man's life,—success in his undertakings, the high regard of all who know him, and the kindest relations between the community at large and the important private interests represented by him in his official capacity.

Fifty years ago, when the subject of this sketch, a mere child, was leaving his widowed mother's side to learn his trade, the public mind was just beginning to be aroused from its long lethargy to a consideration of the abolition of slavery in the United States. The sleep of men over the subject had been long, and their consciences seemed hardly to have suffered a disturbing dream. Church as well as State was a participator in the system, and with unbecoming haste rose up to put beyond its fellowship and pale the first agitators of emancipation. Garrison had just been released, through the kindness of Arthur Tappan, from an imprisonment of forty-nine days in Baltimore jail for saying in a newspaper that the taking of a cargo of negro slaves from Baltimore to New Orleans was an act of "domestic piracy," and was issuing the first number of the Liberator, taking for his motto, "My country is the world, my countrymen are all mankind," and declaring, "I am in earnest, I will not equivocate, I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch, I will be heard."

The agitation of the abolition of slavery, which was to end only with emancipation, had thus begun. The discussion found its way into the public prints, and among the thinking circles of all rural New England. The blacksmith's apprentice read what the newspapers had to say, and listened to the neighborhood discussions on the great question. His sense of justice and humanity was aroused, and he adopted the motto and declaration of purpose as announced by Garrison; and from early youth till the time when Lincoln's proclamation assured the full success of the object aimed at, Mr. Wallingford was the earnest friend of the slave and the active promoter of all schemes looking to his emancipation. With Garrison, Phillips, Parker, Douglas, Rogers, and the other leading anti-slavery men he was a hearty co-worker, and for years on terms of warm personal friendship.

During the winter of 1849-50, Hon. Jeremiah Clemens, of Alabama, made a speech in the United States Senate, in which he claimed that Northern mechanics and laborers stood upon a level with Southern slaves, and that the lot of the latter was in fact envious when compared with that of the former classes. This speech at once called out from Hon. John P. Hale, then a member of the Senate, a reply in keeping with the demands of the occasion and with the great powers of Mr. Hale as an orator. Soon after a meeting of the mechanics of Dover was held, at which Mr. Wallingford presided, and at which resolutions expressing the feelings of the meeting towards Mr. Clemens' speech were passed and a copy furnished to that gentleman by Mr. Wallingford. Upon the receipt of these resolutions Senator Clemens published in the New York Herald a letter addressed to Mr. Wallingford, propounding ten questions. These questions were framed evidently with the design not so much of getting information about the actual condition of the workmen of the free States as to draw from Mr. Wallingford some material that could be turned to the disadvantage of the system of free labor. Mr. Wallingford replied through the press, Feb. 6, 1850, in a letter which at once answered the impulsive and haughty "owner of men," and triumphantly vindicated our system of free labor. For directness of reply, density, and clearness of style, few published letters have equaled it. It must have afforded Mr. Clemens material for reflection, and it is not known that he afterwards assailed the workmen of the nation.

From the formation of the Republican party, Mr. Wallingford has been one of its active supporters. Though no man has been more decided in his political convictions, or more frank in giving expression to them, no one has been more tolerant of the opinions of others, or more scrupulous in his methods of political warfare. Despising the tricks of the mere partisan, and abhorring politics as a trade, he has always been content to rest the success of his party on an open, free discussion of the issues involved. Not deeming it consistent with his obligations to his company to spend his time in the public service, he has refused to accede to the repeated propositions of his political friends to support him for important official positions, but he was a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1876, and Presidential elector for 1876, casting his vote for Hayes and Wheeler. He is, and has been for years, president of the Savings-Bank for the County of Strafford, a director of the Strafford National Bank, president of the Dover Library Association, and a director in the Dover and Winnisseege Railroad. In his religious belief Mr. Wallingford is a Unitarian, and an active member of the Unitarian Society in Dover.

COL. ANDREW H. YOUNG.

James Young emigrated to this country from Scotland, and in Philadelphia married Margaret Sloan. To them was born a son, William Young, who married Charity Howe. Among their children was Aaron Young. He was a man of unusual native ability, which enabled him to take a prominent place in Barrington, N. H., where he passed his days, and in the Whig party, with whose interest in the State he was largely identified. He was a representative in the General Court and selectman for many years. He married Lydia Daniels, who was a daughter of Clement and Esther (Daniels-) Daniels. Aaron Young died in 1854, leaving, with other children, Andrew H. Young, the subject of this sketch, who was born June 16, 1827. He passed his boyhood on his father's farm and in the public schools of the town, receiving from this two-fold source the thoroughly practical education which has been a grand element in our American civilization. In 1852 he was elected superintendent of schools in his native town. In 1855, Mr. Young removed to Dover, N. H., and that year was elected Register of Deeds for Strafford County. He continued in this position for four years. In 1860 he was appointed clerk of the Supreme Judicial Court for the county. On the breaking out of the civil war Mr. Young resigned his office and entered the Union army, Oct. 22, 1861, as lieutenant and quartermaster of the Seventh New Hampshire Volunteers. Nov. 26, 1862, Lieut. Young was promoted by President Lincoln to be captain and quartermaster of the United States volunteers. He served as post quartermaster at Fort Jefferson and St. Augustine, Fla., both commanded by Col. Haldimand S. Putnam. He was also commissary of subsistence at both posts. Subsequently Capt. Young was assigned to the Army of the Potomac, and was quartermaster of the Second Brigade, Second Division of the Second Corps, commanded by Col. N. J. Hall, chief quartermaster of the First Division Second Corps, commanded by Gen. Francis Barlow, chief quartermaster of the Third Division of the Second Corps, commanded by Gen. Alexander Hayes, and acting chief quartermaster of the Second Corps, commanded by Gen. Winfield S. Hancock.

Col. Young was in all the campaigns of the Army of the Potomac from December, 1862, to July, 1864. He was appointed paymaster of the United States army by President Lincoln, May 24, 1864, being first assigned to the Army of the Potomac, and subsequently to the department of the Platte, with headquarters at Denver, Colorado Territory, and Fort Laramie, Wyoming Territory. He was brevetted, March 13, 1865, lieutenant-colonel by President Johnson, for meritorious conduct during the entire war.

In May, 1866, Col. Young resigned his position in the army, and was honorably mustered out July 30th, having been in the military service four years and ten months. April 29, 1869, he was appointed by President Grant collector of internal revenue for the First Congressional District, New Hampshire. He held the office thirteen years, the last six years being collector for the entire State. He resigned this office April 29, 1882.

Commissioner Raum, in accepting the resignation, bore testimony in a very special way to the great efficiency and utmost integrity which had characterized Col. Young's management of his office. As quartermaster and paymaster in the army, and collector of internal revenue for New Hampshire, Col. Young has received and disbursed many millions of dollars without the loss or waste of a single dime. He has been president of the Dover Five-Cent Savings-Bank, and is at the present time one of its directors.

He is one of the corporators of the Strafford County Savings-Bank. He was one of the principal promoters of the Portsmouth and Dover Railroad, and a director for fifteen years. He has been a member of the city government, and was associate justice of the police court of Dover in 1860 and 1861. He is a member of the New Hampshire Historical Society, of the Grand Army of the Republic, and of the military order of the Loyal Legion of the United States. Dartmouth College, in 1861, conferred upon Col. Young the degree of Master of Arts.

In the later years of Col. Young's busy public life he has gratified his natural tastes for agriculture in carrying on his large farm in the town of Madbury. Here his enterprise has been shown in the successful experiments in making his acres produce the finest crops in all this fertile region of the State. His farming neighbors have always had the full benefits of his large experience and sound judgment in all matters pertaining to raising stock and crops.

Col. Young is endowed with great common sense, quick perceptions, fine judgment, and an unusual share of those many qualities which are gathered up in that one phrase, "mother-wit." His large acquaintance with public events and prominent men has served to bring these qualities into the foreground of his character. His judgment as respects the living issues in politics and of those influences which shape both national measures and individual actions is remarkably clear and comprehensive.

He has always shown himself to be patriotic and public-spirited. He is wise in planning and energetic in execution. He is magnanimous towards those who differ from him, free from personal animosity in all his political conflicts. He is true to his friends, warm and steadfast in his loyalty to them, and ready to serve them every time.

The sisters and brothers of Col. Young are Esther, wife of John E. Bazzell, of Durham, N. H.; Sophia A., wife of George S. Hanson, Ashland, Mass.; Hon. Jacob D. Young, of Madbury, judge of probate for Strafford County; Aaron Young, of Portsmouth, N. H., for many years connected with the customs and rev-cume departments in that place; and George W. Young, of Clarksville, Va., who has ten years represented Mecklenburg County in the Virginia House of Delegates.

Col. Young, May 12, 1853, was married to Susan Elizabeth Miles, daughter of Col. Tichenor Miles, of Madbury, N. H. They have had four children,—Andrew Hamilton, born May 22, 1856, and died June 18, 1863; Mary Hale, born July 1, 1861, now a member of the junior class of Wellesley College, Mass.; Haldimand Putnam, born Nov. 13, 1863, now a student at the School of Technology, Boston; and Richard Batchelder, born May 17, 1869.

Col. Young's religious associations are with the Congregationalists, and he is a regular attendant upon the service of the First Parish Church at Dover.

Of those towns in the State whose scenery is somewhat quiet, one of the most beautiful is Barrington. A small tract on its western border is level and not fertile, but most of its surface is gently rolling, two decided heights, however, affording beautiful views. The map shows it to be traversed by streams in every part, one important river being the outflow of Bow Lake; and the map shows no less than fourteen ponds, some of them nearly two miles in length, and whose shores, often abrupt, are full of beauty. Magnificent pine forests of the first growth have been carefully preserved to the present generation, and fertile farms are numerous.

Daniel Hall was born in this town, Feb. 28, 1832, and, with slight exceptions, was the descendant of generations of farmers. His first known American ancestor was John Hall, who appears to have come to Dover, N. H., in the year 1649, with his brother Ralph, from Charlestown, Mass. Of this blood was the mother of Governor John Langdon, Tobias Lear (Washington's private secretary), and others of like energy. The emigrant, John Hall, was the first recorded deacon of the Dover First Church, was town clerk, commissioner to try small cases, and a farmer, but mainly surveyor of lands. His spring of beautiful water is still "Hall's Spring," on Dover Neck. His son Ralph was of Dover, a farmer; whose son Ralph, also a farmer, was one of the early settlers of Barrington; whose son Solomon, also a farmer, was of the same town; whose son Daniel, also a farmer, was father of Gilman Hall (his ninth child), who, by his wife, Eliza Tuttle, was father of nine children, Daniel being the first-born. The picturesque old house in which he was born, built by one Hunking, is still standing near Winkley's Pond, an interesting and venerable landmark, but unoccupied and in a ruinous condition. Gilman Hall was early a trader in Dover, but for twenty-five subsequent years was farmer and trader in Barrington, his native town, on the stage road known as the "Waldron's Hill" road. He was representative, and for many years selectman. Daniel's mother was a descendant of John Tuttle, who was judge of the Superior Court for many years prior to the year 1700, residing in Dover.

Daniel Hall's life as a boy was on the farm. He went to the district school a long distance, through snows and heats, and by and by helped in the store. When older, from fourteen years onward, he drove a team to Dover, with wood and lumber, and sold his loads, standing on Central Square. But he had a passion for books, and a burning desire for an education. He learned all he could get in the district school, and when about sixteen years of age he secured two terms, about six months in all, in Stratford Academy,—one term under Ira F. Folsom (D. C. 1848), and one under Rev. Porter S. Burbank. In 1849 he was one term at the New Hampshire Conference Seminary, in Northfield, Rev. Richard S. Rust, principal. Then, for satisfactory reasons, he gave up all academics, returned home, set himself down alone to his Greek, Latin, and mathematics, and with indomitable perseverance prepared for college. He entered Dartmouth in 1850, probably the poorest fitted in his class; but he had the fitting of a determined will, unconquerable industry, a keen intellect, and the fibre of six generations of open-air ancestors, and in 1854 he graduated at the very head of his class, and was valedictorian. It is needless to say, perhaps, that the eldest of nine children had to practice economy, and teach district schools five winters in his native town; and that what small advances he had from his father were repaid, to the last dollar, from his first earnings.

In the fall of 1854 he was appointed a clerk in the New York custom-house, and held the place for some years. He had taken an early interest in politics, being by education a Democrat. But he had always been positively anti-slavery in sentiment. He was dissatisfied with the Kansas-Nebraska bill, and alone of all the clerks in the custom-house, and fearless of the probable result to himself, he openly denounced the Lecompton Constitution policy of Buchanan, and supported Douglas. In consequence he was removed from office in March, 1858.

Returning to Dover, he continued the study of law—which he had commenced in New York—in the office of the eminent lawyer, Daniel M. Christie, and on that gentleman's motion was admitted to the bar at the May term, 1860. He afterwards well repaid Mr. Christie's kindness by an eulogy upon his decease, delivered before the court and subsequently printed. It was regarded as an eloquent and appreciative tribute to Mr. Christie's remarkable qualities of manhood and extraordinary powers as a lawyer.

Mr. Hall, upon his admission to the bar, opened an office in Dover, and commenced practice. In the spring of 1859, just before the State election, in view of the great crisis coming upon the country, at an immense meeting in Dover, he (as did also Judge Charles Doe) withdrew from the Democratic party and cast in his allegiance with the Republicans. With them, where his conscience and political principles alike placed him, has his lot been cast ever since; and it is not improbable that that one addition in later and critical years turned the scale in New Hampshire's political destinies.

It was an episode in his life that in 1859 he was appointed by the Governor and Council school commissioner for Strafford County, and reappointed in 1860. His early training in the country district school, his work as master in the winters, and his hard-earned higher education qualified him eminently for the practical duties of this office.

In the autumn of 1861, Mr. Hall was appointed secretary of the United States Senate committee to investigate the surrender of the Norfolk navy-yard. This committee consisted of John P. Hale, Andrew Johnson, and James W. Grimes. Soon after he was appointed clerk of the senate committee on naval affairs at Washington, of which Mr. Hale was chairman. He served in this capacity until March, 1862; but he wished for more immediate participation in the great struggle then in progress. The conflict, which had its symptoms in the Lee-Compton strife, had become war, and the young man who had then sacrificed effort for principle was ready for a still greater sacrifice. In March, 1862, he was commissioned aide-de-camp and captain in the regular army of the United States. He was assigned to duty with Gen. John C. Fremont; but before he had time to join that officer Gen. Fremont had retired from command, and Capt. Hall was transferred to the staff of Gen. A. W. Whipple, then in command at Arlington Heights of the troops and works in front of Washington on the south side of the Potomac. In September, 1862, a few days after the battle of Antietam, Gen. Whipple joined the Army of the Potomac, and eventually marched with it to the front of Fredericksburg. On the 13th of December, 1862, he was in the battle of Fredericksburg, crossing the river with the Third Corps, and taking part in the sanguinary assault upon the works which covered Marye's Heights.

At the battle of Chancellorsville he was in the column sent out to cut Jackson's line as he moved in front of the army, and in the gallant action of the Third Division of the Third Corps, under Gen. Whipple, of whose staff he was a member, and was with that lamented officer when he fell mortally wounded. Capt. Hall was then assigned to the staff of Gen. Oliver O. Howard, commander of the Eleventh Corps, and with him went to Gettysburg. His position in that action was important. When Gen. Reynolds, commanding the First Corps, had advanced through the town and encountered the enemy, Gen. Howard, then moving up and about five miles to the rear, hearing the heavy firing, ordered Capt. Hall to ride forward as rapidly as possible, find Gen. Reynolds, ascertain the condition of affairs, and obtain his orders. Capt. Hall's fleet horse soon covered the distance, and he found Gen. Reynolds himself in an advanced and exposed position from the enemy's fire. He did his errand. Gen. Reynolds said he had met the enemy in force, and sent the order to Gen. Howard to bring up his corps with all possible dispatch. Scarcely had Capt. Hall got back through the town when he was overtaken by the intelligence that Gen. Reynolds was mortally wounded, and near the cemetery he met Gen. Howard impatiently coming up in advance of his corps. Passing Cemetery Ridge, Gen. Howard said, "That is the place to fight this battle," and directed Capt. Hall to take a battery from the leading division and place it in position on the crest of the hill. This was done, and that battery, the first planted on Cemetery Hill, remained on that spot through the three days of the conflict. When Gen. Howard took his own place there, Capt. Hall was of course with him, and on the second day of the engagement was slightly wounded by a shell. These details are given simply to place on record, in this permanent form, his testimony to the justice of the claim made by the friends of Gen. Howard that he was fully entitled to the thanks voted him by Congress for selecting Cemetery Hill and holding it as the battle-ground of the great and glorious battle of Gettysburg.

In the latter part of 1863 his health suffered, and he was forced to leave the service in December, 1863. But in June, 1864, he was appointed provost-marshal of the First New Hampshire District, being stationed at Portsmouth, and here he remained until the close of the war. The affairs of the office were in some confusion, but his methodical habits soon reduced it to order. During his term of service he enlisted or drafted and forwarded over four thousand men to the army. This service ceased in October, 1865. "He was one of the men," said a substitute broker to the writer of this sketch, "that no man dared approach with a crooked proposition, no matter how much was in it."

Mr. Hall resumed the practice of law in Dover, but in 1866 was appointed clerk of the Supreme Court for Strafford County, and in 1868 judge of the Police Court of the city of Dover. The duties of these offices were performed with his usual sense of justice, but in 1874 the Democratic party, being in power, "addressed" him out of both offices. In the mean time he had been judge-advocate, with the rank of major, in the military of New Hampshire, under Governor Smyth, and held a position on the staff of Governor Harriman which gave him his usual title of colonel.

Col. Hall had long taken a deep interest in political affairs. To him they represented principles. In 1873 he was president of the Republican State Convention at Concord. He had been for some years a member of the Republican State Committee, when, in December, 1873, his abilities as a leader and executive officer were recognized in his selection as chairman of that committee. He so remained until 1877, and conducted the campaigns, State and national, of 1874, 1875, and 1876. These were critical years for the Republican party. The nearly even balance of parties in New Hampshire, the vigor and intensity with which the battles are always fought, and the skill necessary in every department demand abilities and energies of the highest order. The years mentioned surpassed ordinary years in political danger to the Republicans. It is sufficient to say that Col. Hall conducted the last three campaigns to a triumphant issue. So decisive were the successive victories that the tide was turned, and from that time the State has not swerved from Republican allegiance.

In 1876, Col. Hall was chairman of the New Hampshire delegation to the Republican National Convention at Cincinnati, being chosen at large, unpledged, and with scarce a dissenting vote. Seven delegates voted from first to last for James G. Blaine, but Col. Hall, with ex-Governor Straw and Hon. Charles H. Burns, voted six times for Mr. Bristow, and on the decisive ballot for Rutherford B. Hayes.

In 1876 and 1877, Mr. Hall was, by appointment of Governor Cheney, reporter of the decisions of the Supreme Court of New Hampshire, and in that honorable position published volumes 56 and 57, New Hampshire Reports.

In 1877 he succeeded Governor Harriman as naval officer at the port of Boston. This office is co-ordinate with that of collector, upon which it is a check. Mr. Hall's business habits, his keen insight, his perfect accuracy, and the ruling principle of his life to do everything well and thoroughly there came into operation. He quietly mastered the details as well as the general work of the department. Regularly at his post, his office became a model in its management, and was commended in the highest terms by the proper officers. When, therefore, his term expired he was reappointed for another four years by President Arthur, with no serious opposition.

Mr. Hall married, Jan. 25, 1877, Sophia, daughter of Jonathan T. and Sarah (Hanson) Dodge, of Rochester, and has one son, Arthur Wellesley Hall, born Aug. 30, 1878. The beautiful house erected and occupied by him in Dover, and adorned with cultivated taste, has not its least charm in the steadily increasing library of carefully-selected literature, to whose study he devotes the hours not required by official duties.

He attends the First Church of Dover, the Congregational Church, where his emigrant ancestors held office two centuries and a quarter ago. He is a radical teetotaler, and deeply interested in the cause of temperance. It is his personal request to have his great love for the horse, and, indeed, for all animals, spoken of in this sketch.

Mr. Hall's gentle, courteous, and unassuming manners do not meet the common idea of the bold and sagacious politician. His modest conversation will suggest scholarly instincts, but requires time to show the breadth of his culture. Public addresses have, on occasions demanded, exhibited the thoughtful political student, a patriotic love of country, and the ripeness of the accomplished scholar. Fidelity to every engagement, good faith to every principle espoused, firmness in determination, and usefulness in every work undertaken have insured him success. But in a life still so young it is fair to assume that recognitions of public respect will be greater than any trusts yet given, or reputation achieved in his profession, the field of long-past battles, or the offices of public honor.

COL. JOHN BRACEWELL, A.M.

The subject of this sketch was born June 18, 1837, in Clitheroe, England. Clitheroe is a busy cotton-manufacturing town on the Ribble, and in the greatest cotton-manufacturing district of the world, Lancashire.

The father, Miles Bracewell, from his early boyhood had been engaged in printing calico, having served his apprenticeship with James Thompson & Sons, who owned and managed the Primrose Print-Works. James Thompson was a famous manufacturer, his enterprise and liberality being known throughout Europe. For many years Miles Bracewell had charge of the "color department" in the Primrose Print-Works. He afterwards went into business for himself, and at the time of his death was the senior partner and principal owner of two print-works,—one at Oakenshaw and another at Kersal Vale.

It was while the father was in the service of James Thompson that John Bracewell, then a very small boy, was regularly apprenticed to this distinguished manufacturer. The institution of apprenticeship in anything like its English thoroughness is little practiced in this country. For a long period in England the term apprentice was applied equally to such as were being taught a trade or a learned profession. The term of seven years was regarded as much a necessity for the learner in any craft as for the scholar seeking to attain the degree of doctor or master in the liberal arts. Although the laws which formerly made the apprenticeship compulsory have been abolished in England, yet the principle is universally recognized there in the form of a voluntary contract. Of its immense advantages in the way of securing the most thorough knowledge and highest skill in the learner no one can doubt. Mr. John Bracewell, who probably to-day holds the foremost place among those engaged in his business in this country, is a living argument for the excellence of the apprentice system. He began his tutelage as a lad. He began at the lowest round in the ladder of his advancement, and was long and rigidly held at each until he could safely mount the higher one. There was a very superior French chemist employed in the Primrose Works, and no little of the boy's studies were under him.

When eighteen years of age Mr. Bracewell had established such a reputation for proficiency in the mysteries of color that he was offered a fine position in a great carpet manufactory in France, but his father advised him to decline this flattering offer, feeling that the responsibility was too great for one so young. That subtle but irresistible influence which for so many years had been drawing such tides of population from Europe to America was already settling the question as to the country where this young man was to work out his great success. Only a month after he had declined to go to France he received and accepted the offer of a position as assistant manager in the Merrimac Print-Works, Lowell, Mass. There he remained five years and a half, winning for himself a distinguished reputation by the energy and skill of his management. Certainly it argues some unusual qualities in his work while there, some extraordinary gifts and capacities in his nature, that could have led the Cochecho Manufacturing Company to call this young man of twenty-three years of age to its most responsible position, that of superintendent of its print-works. There were no less than thirteen applicants for this office. The directors, with entire unanimity, made choice of this youngest of them all, and gave to him the unlimited charge of the most important department of their great industry. Soon after entering upon his new duties, Mr. Bracewell took advantage of the suspension of work in the manufactory, made necessary at that period of the civil war, to enlarge his scientific knowledge by attending lectures on analytic chemistry at Harvard College. He studied with great thoroughness this science during a five months' course, and at the same time directed the many repairs and changes which were being made in the print-works at Dover. With the beginning of the year 1861, Mr. Bracewell took up his residence in Dover. The remarkable enterprise and judgment of the new manager made themselves at once felt. For just twenty years he continued in his position. These years witnessed a series of brilliant successes. He showed himself to be a genius in his profession. To his originating, creative mind he joins an unusual power of adapting to his own uses suggestions coming from whatever source. By his sheer abilities, his indomitable energy, his quickness of insight, his tireless perseverance, and his perfect command of the minute details of every branch of his work, Mr. Bracewell soon lifted the Cochecho goods to the very head of their class, and held them there to the last day of his service. The production of the print-works very nearly quadrupled during this period.

In 1864, Mr. Bracewell was married to Mary Harriet Hope, of Lowell, Mass., whose noble character death has made the more precious to many friends. There were born to them three daughters and one son, all of whom are living.

During Mr. Bracewell's residence in Dover he endeared himself to all classes of people by his large-hearted liberality, his great geniality, and his keen personal interest in whatever affected the welfare of the city or the condition of every individual in it. He was an ardent supporter of his church, which he greatly loved, and every good cause in the community. He was quick to suggest, and ready to lead any movement which was helpful to the material and moral advancement of Dover. With a view of benefiting the city, and also as a sound investment for his own advantage, Mr. Bracewell built, in 1879, a substantial and attractive block, consisting of nine stores, which spans the Cochecho River. It bids long to stand, a fitting monument of his public spirit and wise foresight.

Though born and educated an Englishman, he became an ardent, patriotic American citizen from the very day that he touched American soil. His pride and hopes for America are as intense as any native son's. His love for Dover is as tender and steadfast as though its air was the first he breathed. The church with which he first united he still regards as his home. He long served her as a most efficient superintendent of its Sunday-school, and when he was about to remove his residence from Dover, out of a great desire to see the church freed from the burden of a debt of thirteen thousand dollars, Mr. Bracewell, by his payment of a tenth of the sum, led on others to such generous donations that the debt was speedily extinguished.

Mr. Bracewell may still be regarded as a New Hampshire son and a citizen of Dover. His nature will not allow him to lose elsewhere the very great interest which twenty years' sojourn here has created in him. It may well be expected that he will some time return to permanently abide among friendships whose preciousness he and his host of friends so fully appreciate.

In January, 1881, Mr. Bracewell received an offer to go into business at North Adams, Mass., and as the physicians thought his wife's health would be better there than in Dover, he decided to make the change. The directors of the Cochecho Manufacturing Company, by offer of an increase of salary from ten thousand to fifteen thousand dollars a year, and other inducements, sought to retain Mr. Bracewell in their employment. Mr. Bracewell, however, removed to North Adams, purchasing a third interest in the Freeman Manufacturing Company of that place, and the same success which was acquired in Dover has followed his abilities into the great business which he represents at North Adams. The Windsor calicoes and other products of the Freeman Manufacturing Company already stand in the market among the foremost of their class.

John C. White

In 1877, Mr. Bracewell received the degree of Master of Arts from Dartmouth College, a distinction well earned and worthily bestowed. During Governor Prescott's term of office, Mr. Bracewell served as a member of his staff, with rank of colonel.

Mr. Bracewell's remarkable activity has not been shut into his business. The intensity of his nature comes out to an undiminished degree in his politics, his friendships, his public spirit, and his religious faith. His sympathies are quick and universal; his enthusiasms are communicative and inspiring; his affections are tender and loyal.

CHARLES M. MURPHY.

We live in days when the successes of men apparently born to lives of grinding toil are a pregnant sign of the times.

Such opportunities are now open to him who has a good order of ability, with high health and spirits, who has all his wits about him, and feels the circulation of his blood and the motion of his heart, that the lack of early advantages form no barrier to success.

Charles M. Murphy, son of John and Mary M. (Meador) Murphy, was born in Alton, Belknap Co., N. H., Nov. 3, 1835. In 1842 his parents moved to Barnstead, N. H., and settled upon the Tasker farm, at the south of the town. Here the child grew in stature, and filled out and braced his frame by hard manual labor.

Little record is left of these years of severe work and continuous struggle, but there is little doubt that the discipline developed an indomitable will and sturdy self-reliance, which alone enable poor men's children to grapple with the world, that under more favorable circumstances might never have shown their full capacity of force and tenacity.

Again, it is widely believed, and nowhere more strongly than in opulent cities and busy marts, that a boy is better bred on a farm, in close contact with the ground, than elsewhere. He is full as likely to be generous, brave, humane, honest, and straightforward as his city-born contemporary, while as to self-dependence, strength, and stamina, he ordinarily has a great advantage over his rival.

He attended the district school during the winter terms until of an age suitable to leave the parental care, when he enjoyed for two terms the advantages of the academy at Norwich, Vt. At school it appears that he was diligent and ambitious, and from his natural cheerfulness of temperament very active in all athletic exercises. Then began the active and practical duties of life, and, being the oldest of four boys, for some years he assisted his father in educating and advancing the interests of his brothers. John E. Murphy became a prominent dentist, practicing in Pittsfield, N. H., and Marblehead, Mass., and dying at the early age of thirty-five. Frank Murphy, M.D., graduate of Dartmouth College, practiced his profession in Stratford and Northwood, but died in the very flush and promise of life, at the age of twenty-nine. Albert Warren Murphy, D.D.S., graduate of the Philadelphia Dental College, after one year's practice in Boston, removed, in 1872, to Paris, France, where his professional labors brought him both credit and profit. At the expiration of two years an active interest in Spanish affairs, and a desire to test the business advantages of the country, led him to Spain. He soon settled in Madrid, and in 1879 was appointed dentist to the royal court.

Relieved from his generous labors at home, the subject of our sketch was married, at the age of twenty-two, to Sabrina T. Clark, daughter of Isaac Clark, Esq., of Barnstead, N. H., and for six months tried independent farming; but though fully aware what a life full of joy and beauty and inspiration is that of the country, and not destitute of a natural taste for rural pursuits, at the expiration of the time named he surrendered his acres to his father, and with less than one hundred and fifty dollars moved to Dover, and began the study of dentistry with Dr. Jefferson Smith. To this business he brought the same will-power and ability to prolong the hours of labor which marked his home-life, and in two years was pronounced competent to practice in his new calling. Dr. Smith soon died, and the recently emancipated student not only succeeded very largely to his practice, but enlarged and built upon it till a reputation and an income were secured which made travel and study easy and profitable. For eighteen years this patient, hopeful man labored and experimented, adding each season to his knowledge and skill, losing hardly a day, except while studying for his degree at the Boston Dental School. In 1878, as the result of long and careful study of the business interests of the country, he withdrew entirely from his profession, and embarked his all in the precarious occupation of a broker. Here his coolness, sagacity, and equableness of temper found their proper field, and such a measure of success has followed as falls to the lot of few men not bred from youth amid the fluctuations of the stock-market. In his new occupation he is indefatigable in procuring information, and alike keen in discerning new points of view, and shrewd in contrasting them with those which are older and well known. Very naturally the subject of our sketch took a lively interest in political affairs upon becoming of age. A strong and devoted Republican, in his adopted city his influence in local politics has been felt for years. He was a member of the State House of Representatives in 1871 and 1873, and attached to the staff of Governor Straw; appointed and confirmed as consul to Moscow, honor declined; a member of the Chicago Convention in 1880, where he stoutly supported Blaine so long as a ray of hope remained; president of the Dover Five-Cents Savings-Bank,—from a state of torpor and weakness it has grown under his guiding hand into activity and strength; elected mayor of the city of Dover in 1880, and recently chosen for another term; recipient of the honorary degree of A.B. from Lewis College in 1881. So through all his mature life Col. Murphy has been a busy man. But the energetic and successful are not exempt from the sorrows common to humanity. Three children, who if spared might put off to a distant day the weariness that inevitably comes with advancing years, died while young, and finally the partner of all his vicissitudes bade him a final adieu.

His second wife, Mrs. Eliza T. Hanson, widow of the late John T. Hanson, of this city, dispenses a gracious hospitality in the spacious and richly-furnished Cushing Street mansion.

In closing, we may add Col. Murphy combines qualities which are generally found apart,—a love for work amounting to dedication, and a readiness to assist the unfortunate which seems ingrained. His abode is full of cheerfulness. No one comes there who does not receive a hearty welcome; no one departs without feeling as if leaving a home.

PAUL A. STACKPOLE, A.M., M.D.

Paul A. Stackpole, son of Samuel and Rosanna Stackpole, was born in Rochester, N. H., Feb. 12, 1817. Early in life he evinced a determination to secure a thorough education, and although not encouraged by either friends or relatives, he persisted with that tenacity characteristic of the man, and after a struggle with adverse circumstances which called forth all the determination and courage of his buoyant nature, he found himself master of the situation, ready to face the conflicts of the world, with a liberal education, absolutely essential to the successful study and practice of the medical profession.

After securing the advantages afforded by the common schools of his native town, he attended the Rochester Academy, and when only seventeen years of age we find him engaged in the laudable vocation of teaching school. He subsequently attended Wolfborough Academy, and again taught school, this time in Somersworth. During all this period the money young Stackpole earned was paid, or at least the greater portion of it, to his father. He had now determined to enter Phillips' Andover Academy, then and now a celebrated institution.

He left Dover by stage, and arrived in Andover with six dollars in his pocket, barely enough to pay his initiation fee, without a dollar to advance for tuition, and the immediate future looked not particularly bright, as it was a rule of the institution that payment for tuition be made in advance. Young Stackpole called on the principal, Prof. Osgood Johnson, and acquainted the learned tutor plainly with his position and determination, that he had no money or friends, but he was determined to secure an education, and if by any means he might be allowed to enter the school he would endeavor not to bring discredit upon the institution nor prove recreant to the confidence imposed. His frank and manly manner won the regard of Professor Johnson, and he was admitted. He pursued his studies with indefatigable zeal, and it may be stated briefly that he was ever foremost in his class and became a warm friend of Professor Johnson.

Professor Johnson died while he was a student, and was succeeded by the late Samuel Taylor, who at once formed a warm friendship for young Stackpole, which lasted through life. He took the customary course of three years, graduated, and left Andover with one hundred dollars in his pocket.

He then intended to enter Harvard College and take the regular course, that he might be the better prepared for the study of medicine, which profession he had selected as his life work. His friends in Dover and vicinity, however, among whom was Dr. Joseph H. Smith, persuaded him otherwise, and he commenced the study of medicine with Dr. Smith. This was in 1840. After remaining one year he went to Boston and connected himself with the celebrated Boylston School, prominent among whose lights were Drs. Bowditch, Stedman, Perry, etc. He passed much of the time, however, in the office of Dr. Bowditch, and with Dr. Stedman in hospital practice. He also attended lectures at Harvard, and subsequently at Dartmouth, where he graduated in 1843, and the degree of A.M. was subsequently conferred upon him by this college.

He then settled in Dover, taking a prominent position among his medical brethren, where he has since remained in the active practice of his profession, and was early honored with the presidency of the Strafford District Medical Society and the New Hampshire State Medical Society.

While Dr. Stackpole has ever enjoyed a large and lucrative practice he has also been active in political circles, and has done yeoman service in the councils of his party. He is a Democrat of the Jeffersonian type, and an able and fearless exponent of the principles of that party.

In 1874 he was one of the founders of the State Press, a Democratic weekly, in this city, and since 1878 has been its political editor and nominal manager. He wields a trenchant pen, and adds the graces of a lively style.

In 1845, Dr. Stackpole united in marriage with Elizabeth G., only child of Charles P. Hills, of Haverhill, Mass. She died in 1852, leaving three children,—Charlotte E., deceased, and Charles H. and Harry H., both residents of Boston.

T. J. W. PRAY.

T. J. W. Pray, A.M., M.D., was born in Lebanon, Me., and is the son of Maj. Moses and Lydia (Worcester) Pray. In his early years he labored with his parents until about seventeen years of age, when he was thrown upon his own resources, and almost unaided through his own industry and perseverance obtained his education. The instruction given in the public schools at that day was meagre, and only a few months in a year were allowed for instruction. Not satisfied with the limited means for knowledge in his native town, he went to the academy at North Parsonfield, Me. In a few years afterwards he entered his name at the South Berwick Academy, under the tuition of that excellent instructor, Joshua D. Berry. The school was then in a very flourishing condition, and the most of his classical education was obtained at the latter institution. In 1841 he joined the sophomore class of Bowdoin College. This was one of the largest classes that ever entered there, and it numbered many who have occupied prominent positions in public and private life. Among this number may be mentioned Hon. C. A. Goddard, of Portland, Me.; Hon. W. W. Virgin, judge of the Superior Court of Maine; D. R. Hastings, of Fryeburg, Me.; H. G. Herrick, of Lawrence, Mass.; Hon. S. J. Anderson, president of the Portland and Ogdensburg Railroad, and others.

In order to get his acedemical and collegiate education, Dr. Pray was employed in teaching school both before and during his college career. He was a successful teacher in Lebanon, Shapleigh, Sanford, Westbrook, and Pittston, Me. Soon after his graduation he was offered a select school in the neighboring village of Great Falls. He continued this school with remarkable success for two years, when he was compelled to abandon it on account of ill health. This school grew in reputation, and among his pupils who have gained fame were George W. Burleigh, Esq., Hon. E. A. Rollins, of Philadelphia, and other leading citizens of the Granite State.

Soon after Dr. Pray entered his name with J. H. Jewett, M.D., of South Berwick, Me., a physician of excellent repute, and also was under the tuition of Prof. E. R. Peaslee, of New York City. His first course of medical lectures was at Bowdoin College, and his second was at Harvard University, where he took the degree of Doctor of Medicine in the spring of 1848. He at once located in Dover, and very soon took a prominent position in his profession. He has been devotedly attached to it, and has not been idle in its various duties. Soon after he commenced practice he obtained a prize for the best paper on the "Medical Properties of Sulphur," and in 1857-58 he was appointed orator for the State Medical Society, and chose for his subject, "Nursing Sore Mouth." This paper called out various complimentary notices, and Dr. Isaac Hays, editor of the American Journal of Medical Sciences, truthfully remarked that it "was an able and instructive paper." Among the other papers published and written by him may be named "Report of two Cases of Malpractice," "Menopause," "Modern Stimulation," "Thermometry of Disease."

Dr. Pray, in 1880, as president of the New Hampshire Medical Society, gave the annual address, and selected for his subject "Diphtheria." This is a monograph upon this disease. This address exhibited thorough knowledge of his subject, and is an invaluable contribution to the medical literature of the day. In a letter to Dr. Pray, Dr. H. I. Bowditch, of Boston, Mass., says, "I desire to thank you most heartily for your address on 'Diphtheria.' I do not know when I have read an address more admirable, and if read thoughtfully by physicians and laity it must do much good." The New York Medical Record in a review says the address is a very full and exhaustive discussion of the subject of diphtheria. On all the mooted points the writer shows thorough information and excellent judgment. Dr. M. A. McCollum, of Knoxville, Ill., author of the celebrated work on civil malpractice, adds, "I never have read so satisfactory an address," etc.

Dr. Pray has been president of the Dover Medical Association, and also presiding officer of the Strafford District Medical Society. He has ever manifested an interest in the weal of his adopted city. In a few years after his location in Dover he found the city without a library. By his efforts and the assistance of Capt. Moses Paul, agent of the Cochecho Manufacturing Company, he was the founder of the Dover library. He wrote the subscription-paper, circulated it, and was librarian for quite a number of years.

In educational matters he has been particularly active. He was connected with the schools as one of the committee for about twenty years, and belonged to the State board of education as commissioner of common schools for Strafford County in 1858-59. He was chosen representative to the General Court in 1858-59, and held the position of chairman of the committee on education. He was member of the city government four years, and president of the Common Council for three years during the late Rebellion, at that time a responsible and laborious position. He is a member of the First Congregational Society, and takes much interest in its prosperity.

Dr. Pray has been a promoter of temperance, having been a member of the Sons of Temperance for twenty years, and been Grand Worthy Patriarch of the State society. He has been selected twice to give the graduation address before the medical class of Dartmouth College, and has held other responsible trusts.

In November, 1851, he united in marriage with Sarah E., daughter of John H. Wheeler, Esq., and their family consisted of two children,—John Wheeler Pray, a practicing physician in Northwood, N. H., and Thomas M., an attorney of Dover. Mrs. Pray died in 1857, and in June, 1870, he married Martha A., daughter of Rev. S. S. Matthews, and they have one child, Mary E.

ELISHA RHODES BROWN.

Nothing is more interesting in the histories of families than the very distinctive and often powerful characteristics which with such uniformity run through their generations. The family of Brown, which traces its New England origin to Chad Brown, of Providence, R. I., seems to have received from him to an unusual degree his own marked traits,—a sturdy intelligent independence, a profound religious spirit, and great business capacities, joined to equal benevolence of heart. In this line are found the four brothers,—Nicholas, Joseph, John, and Moses,—“all uncommon men, remarkable for broad views, and for the active and efficient prosecution of public aims.” Through the munificent generosity of Nicholas, Brown University was founded, and by the princely gifts of John it was from time to time richly endowed.

The subject of this sketch represents the eighth generation in this Providence branch of the Brown family. The line is as follows:

1. Chad, who was exiled from Massachusetts “for conscience’ sake,” in 1637, with his wife Elizabeth and son John. He was one of the original proprietors of the Providence Purchase, and pastor of the Baptist Church in Providence. He is described by Dr. Hague in his “Historical Discourse” as follows: “Contemporary with Roger Williams, he possessed a cooler temperament, and was happily adapted to sustain the interests of religion just where that great man failed. Not being affected by the arguments of the Seekers, he maintained his standing firmly in a church which he believed to be founded on the rock of eternal truth, even ‘the Word of God, which abideth forever.’” He died about 1665, leaving five sons, of whom the eldest was

2. John. He was a member of the Town Council in 1665, and elder in the Baptist Church. He married Mary, daughter of Rev. Obadiah Holmes, second pastor of the First Baptist Church, Newport, R. I. Of their five children the second was

3. James, who became pastor of the Baptist Church, Providence. He married Mary, granddaughter of William Harris, one of the first six who came to Providence in 1636. He died in 1732. He had ten children, of whom the tenth was

4. Elisha, born May 25, 1717. He married Martha Smith, a descendant of one of the first settlers of Providence. He was a man of great ability, a member of the General Assembly, and became Deputy Governor of the colony of Rhode Island. He died in 1802. Of his sons the fourth bore his own name,—

5. Elisha, who was born June 1, 1749. He married Elizabeth Brown, of Rehoboth, and died in 1827. Among their children were twin brothers, Elisha and

6. John, born Jan. 20, 1784. John married Elizabeth Daggett, of Seekonk, R. I. Their second child was

7. Colville Dana, born July 4, 1814; married, July 16, 1840, Mary Eliza, daughter of Capt. Elisha H.

Rhodes. During the war he was connected with the commissariat department, purchasing for the government large supplies of provisions and horses. Since the close of the war he has been superintendent of the Capitol grounds, Washington.

8. Elisha Rhodes, born in Providence, R. I., March 28, 1847. He came while a child with his father to live in Dover, N. H. Here he was educated in the public schools. While a young man he became a clerk in the store of Charles Trickey. In December, 1867, at the early age of twenty years, he was elected to the responsible position of teller in the Strafford National Bank, which, under different titles, had been in existence from about the beginning of the century, but which in 1865 had become a national bank. Its cashier at this time was Dr. Asa Tufts, who, for upwards of twenty years, had been filling this office with great acceptability, his fidelity and integrity having won for him the entire confidence of the bank directors and the community at large. The bank has always taken high rank in financial circles as being strong because of its conservative and able management. On the retirement of Dr. Tufts in December, 1875, Mr. Brown was elected cashier. Its board of directors has been composed of men of distinguished ability, such as Hon. Daniel M. Christie, W. S. Stevens (now its president), John McDuffee, Zimri S. Wallingford, Dr. Jeremiah Horne, Charles Woodman, Frank Hobbs, Charles H. Sawyer, Judge Jeremiah Smith. No moneyed institution in the State outranks it in character and success. With a capital of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, it shows a book surplus of seventy thousand dollars, and this without reckoning its premium and real estate account, which amounts to about thirty-five thousand dollars, making in all over one hundred thousand dollars surplus. It has been impossible to purchase this bank's stock for some time past. The brilliant and yet most substantial success which has characterized the operations of the bank during the past few years is in no small part attributable to the remarkably good judgment and foresight of its cashier. The able men associated with Mr. Brown in the management of the bank's affairs speak in no stinted praise of his keen perceptions, and his full acquaintance with market values and the conditions of investment. He is superior as a judge of credit. In the delicate matters pertaining to his office he shows remarkable tact, treating all persons with such kindly consideration that none can take offense.

Mr. Brown has been a member of the Masonic fraternity for thirteen years, and of the Odd-Fellows for seven. He is also connected with the State Historical Society, in all the affairs of which he takes an intelligent interest.

Mr. Brown is true to his ancestral traits; he combines with rare business faculties a large benevolence and a deep religious faith; his charities are wide and constant, and “without observation.” The full weight of his well-balanced character and his ever-increasing influence is on the side of every public measure which makes for the prosperity, peace, and purity of the community. He is a member of the First Church (Congregational), and his activities are devoted to its welfare.

Mr. Brown (Oct. 18, 1870) married Fannie, youngest daughter of the late Dr. Alphonzo Bickford, who held a foremost place in his profession, and, as a man, was largely respected for his public spirit, liberal and intelligent views, and sterling integrity. They have two boys,—Alphonzo Bickford, born Jan. 23, 1872, and Harold Winthrop, born Nov. 8, 1875.

ALONZO H. QUINT.

Alonzo H. Quint was born March 22, 1828, at the house of his maternal grandfather, Barnstead, N. H. He was the only child of George and Sally W. (Hall) Quint. His father, a remarkably skillful mechanic, was in manufacturing business in Dover, N. H., for over fifty years. Dr. Quint's mother was granddaughter of Elder Benjamin Randall, the founder of the Free Baptist denomination in America. Dr. Quint's father's father and three great-grandfathers were soldiers in the Revolution; two collateral were with John Paul Jones; a great-grandfather was a soldier in the French and Indian war, at the massacre of Fort William and Henry, and his ancestor, Shadrech Walton (Judge S. J. C.), was colonel of New Hampshire troops at the capture of Port Royal. The earliest American ancestor of his mother was Deacon John Hall, of Dover, ancestor also of Hon. Joshua G. Hall, now member of Congress, and Col. Daniel Hall, both of Dover.

Dr. Quint fitted for college at Franklin Academy, Dover, and graduated at Dartmouth College in 1846. Being but eighteen years of age, he divided the next three years between manual labor in his father's employ and reading medicine; when twenty-one entered Andover Theological Seminary, where he graduated in 1852, but took another year of post-graduate study. He was ordained the first pastor of the Central (Congregational) Church, Jamaica Plain (now a part of the city of Boston), Dec. 27, 1853. Here he remained until the commencement of the war of 1861, when he entered (May, 1861) the service as chaplain of the regiment under Col. G. H. Gordon (a graduate of West Point and a soldier in Mexico), the Second Massachusetts Infantry, the first regiment authorized and raised for three years' service. The church at Jamaica Plain gave him leave of absence, refusing the resignation which he tendered; this leave was extended for two years, when he insisted on a separation. He took part in the gallant history of that distinguished regiment, which, with Gen. Hooker in 1864, "as is known to two armies, has no superior." It served in Virginia, Maryland, and under Sherman in the centre and to the sea. Of its first list of men, the casualties in action were (by official figures) precisely 600, in 115 killed, 70 mortally wounded, 415 wounded not mortally.

Dr. Quint continued in service until the summer of 1864, when in the campaign to Atlanta by advice of surgeon he was mustered out. He had been officially mentioned for good conduct on the field, and especially in two important battles. Abbott, in his history of the civil war, writes of him as "one of the most heroic chaplains of the war," and other writers have borne a like testimony to his fidelity.

July 23, 1864, Dr. Quint was installed pastor of the North Congregational Church in New Bedford, Mass. This church, temporarily depressed, rose under his ministry to a remarkably influential position. The congregation was largely increased, and the pastor's peculiar abilities were making themselves felt throughout the entire denomination. After a ministry of eleven years Dr. Quint felt constrained on account of failing health to resign his position. The malarial fever which he had contracted during the war had made it impossible for him during the last months of his pastorate to do scarcely any service. Although his attached people offered him a leave of absence, he felt it to be his duty to insist upon his withdrawal.

In July, 1875, Dr. Quint came to Dover, and has ever since resided here in the home once his father's. His health has been fully regained, and he has been enabled to perform a large and varied literary work. In addition to this he has been for the past two years and still is regularly preaching in the pulpit of Broadway Church, Somerville, Mass.

Mr. Quint received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from Dartmouth College in 1866. In 1870 he was elected a trustee of this institution, and still serves in this office. He was by the appointment of the Governor of Massachusetts one of the eight members of the Massachusetts board of education (the term being eight years), and served until he entered the army of the civil war.

For eleven years he was grand chaplain of the Massachusetts Grand Lodge, Free and Accepted Masons. He is also a member of the Odd-Fellows. He was the first person initiated into the Grand Army of the Republic in New England. He helped form the first post (New Bedford), was one of the committee to form its national constitution, and was chaplain-in-chief four years. He was a member of the Massachusetts Historical Society from 1859 until he left the State, its membership being limited to a hundred. He has been for many years a valuable member of the New England Historic Genealogical Society. He was formerly a corresponding and is now a resident member of the New Hampshire Historical Society. He is also a corresponding member of the New York Historical Society. Dr. Quint has published two books, "Potomac and Rapidan" (army letters) and "Record of the Second Massachusetts Infantry." Various sermons and public addresses have also been put into permanent form, among them, notable for its fervid patriotism and eloquent expression, is the oration on the occasion and dedication of the soldiers' monument at Dover; he also performed a similar service at New Bedford. He officiated as chaplain at the dedication of the soldiers' monument on Boston Common. A vast mass of most valuable historical material has been contributed by Dr. Quint during the past twenty-five years to the columns of the Dover Enquirer. Other results of his patient and wide research in this field of literature are to be found in the "New England Historical and Genealogical Register" and in the printed volumes of the "Proceedings of the Massachusetts Historical Society." Dr. Quint was one of the founders of the Congregational Quarterly, and was one of its editors from 1859 to 1866.

At the present time his literary labors are engaged in preparing two most important histories,—i.e., that of Dover and that of the State of New Hampshire. For more than a quarter of a century Dr. Quint has been busy in gathering in much most recondite and deeply interesting material, which when brought into final shape by him will prove an exceedingly rich contribution to American history.

Dr. Quint's services to the Congregational denomination have been most important and highly appreciated. For twenty-five years he was secretary of the Massachusetts General Association of Congregational Churches, and its moderator in 1865 and 1882. He was chairman of the Business Committee of the National Council of 1865; was chairman of the committee to call a convention of delegates in 1870 to form a National Council of the Congregational Churches of the United States; was chairman of committee to draft its constitution; was temporary presiding officer at the National Council which met at Oberlin in 1871, and was chosen secretary of the Council for three years, and has been continued by re-elections in this office ever since. He has since 1860 edited the "Congregational Year-Book" and other publications giving the statistics of the Congregational Churches, excepting four years, and still has charge of that work.

Dr. Quint preached the last sermon given in the old Brattle Square Church before the Massachusetts Convention of Congregational Ministers. He has been for twenty-two years a director of the American Congregational Association, which has in trust the Congregational Home and great Congregational Library in Boston, and is now senior director. He was for twenty years, to 1882, one of the managers of the Congregational Publishing Society, and, since its incorporation in 1868, secretary of the Board of Ministerial Aid, and one of its fifteen members. He is a corporate member of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. He also preached the election sermon by election of the Massachusetts House of Representatives in 1865.

In 1880 he was chosen member of the New Hampshire House of Representatives from Ward 2, Dover. The Legislature met in June, 1881. He was a member of the Railroad Committee, of the Committee on Old Records, the Committee on the Yorktown Celebration. He was chairman of the Committee on Insane Asylum, and also on the Condition of the Insane in County Alms-houses.

During this session there was a great contest over the chartering of the Lake Shore Railroad, and the passage of a general railroad law, involving the questions of the whole railroad policy of the State. He was the recognized leader upon one side of these questions, as also upon one side of the consideration of constitutional and legal questions involved in the election of senators. In this conflict Dr. Quint took a conspicuous part. In his mastery of the subjects, his clearness of statement, his strength of argument, he showed himself a peer among the veteran lawyers and legislators who stood in the arena of debate. In November, 1882, Dr. Quint was re-elected by an increased majority as representative of his ward.

For a man to have served, as Dr. Quint has, in so many and so diversified offices in church and State, argues the possession by him of an unusual range of powers. His versatility must certainly be remarkable. But, beyond this, to have met these so widely different demands with such an acknowledged ability in every case shows Dr. Quint to belong to that order where we place great men. An analysis of his qualities will strengthen this estimate of him.

Dr. Quint is a man of unusual intellectual force. He impresses every one as being full of will-power. This of itself goes far to make him a natural leader among men. He would dominate men if by nothing else by the sheer strength of his own personality. But to this force are added sharp perceptions, clear foresight, and a righteous purpose. This gives to his remarkable executive powers wise and beneficent direction. It is not less his keen comprehension of the conditions and issues of perplexing questions which arise in discussions than his clearness and strength of self-assertion that enables him so often to set a bewildered assembly right, and unloose the skein of some tangled debate. Dr. Quint is by constitution a logician. His mind is orderly in its movements, and as clear as it is orderly. He is naturally an organizer. He must put persons and things under rules, and hold them to a system, just as he loves to put facts and statistics into due form and relation. But there are other qualities in him rarely found in a man of such executive will and logical reasoning. He has great imaginative force and poetic sentiment.

His sermons and addresses, both those written and those spoken out of the inspiration of the moment, are not only strong in statement and muscular in argument, but they are blossoming out all over with the very flowers of poetry, the conceits of humor, and sentiments of beauty, tenderness, and pathos. This makes Dr. Quint an eloquent speaker. He knows men's feelings, their every-day, homely thoughts and experiences, and he reaches these with great delicacy and directness.

Dr. Quint, too, has a wonderful memory, at once capacities and retentive. It is a storehouse wherein lie most various and abundant materials, all properly shelved and labeled, and forthcoming on demand. Dr. Quint, so strong and assertive in these qualities, has great kindness of heart and charitableness of judgment. He is magnanimous to all, and most truly loyal to his friends. He is the natural defender of the weak, and quick to champion the cause of the wronged. His patriotism is intense. The material elements mingle strongly in him. We can easily understand of him why it was said that he was "one of the most heroic chaplains of the war."

Dr. Quint married, Jan. 31, 1854, Rebecca P., daughter of Allen and Eliza (Page) Putnam, of Salem, Mass. Her father was not less able as a shipmaster in the old-time long voyages than respected as a man. He was president of the Salem Marine Society, and four years surveyor of the port of Salem. His father and grandfather were officers in the army of the Revolution, as also was Mrs. Putnam's father, Col. Page. Mrs. Quint is a great-grandniece of Gen. Israel Putnam, and also of Gen. Rufus Putnam, of the Revolution. Their children have been: (1) George Putnam, who died young; (2) Clara Gadsden, named for her mother's sister, wife of William S. Gadsden, of Charleston, S. C.; (3) Wilder Dwight, now a student in Phillips' Exeter Academy; (4) Katherine Mordant, named from her father's grandmother, and an early ancestor; (5) John Hastings.

George Burley Spalding, the present pastor of the First Church in Dover, was born in Montpelier, Vt., Aug. 11, 1835, son of Dr. James and Eliza (Reed) Spalding. The line of American descent on the paternal side was as follows: Edward, of Chelmsford, Mass., immigrant; Benjamin, whose will was proved April 5, 1679; Edward, of Canterbury, Conn.; Ephraim, of Connecticut; Reuben, of Connecticut; Reuben, who married Jerusha Carpenter, and lived in Sharon, Vt.; Dr. James, and Rev. George Burley.

Deacon Reuben Spalding, grandfather of the subject of this sketch, was one of the early settlers of Vermont, whose life was not more remarkable for his toils, privations, and energy as a pioneer in a new country than for his unbending Christian integrity. He entered Sharon in 1769, and lived on the same farm eighty years. He was a member of the church sixty-one years, and deacon forty-two years. He was distinguished for "the best qualities of the old New England Puritanism."

Dr. James Spalding was the third of twelve children, and for many years a successful practitioner of medicine in Montpelier, Vt., but especially eminent in surgery. He graduated at the Dartmouth Medical School at the age of twenty years. He was more than forty years a member of the Vermont Medical Society, its secretary over twenty years, its president in 1866-68. "His life," says a printed sketch, "was that of the Good Samaritan, a life of toil, prayer, and sympathy for others."

By the line of Reed, the family is of the same blood with Rev. Dr. Gardiner Spring and Rev. Dr. Edwards A. Park. The grandmother of Dr. George B. Spalding, and the grandfather of the late Senator Matthew H. Carpenter, were sister and brother.

George Burley Spalding was the seventh of nine children. He fitted for college at the Washington County Academy, Montpelier, and graduated at the University of Vermont in 1856, being twenty-one years of age. He read law one year in Montpelier, with Hon. Charles W. Willard, and then went to Tallahassee, Fla., where he read law another year with Judge W. C. M. Davis. While in the South he was a regular correspondent of the New York Courier and Enquirer, of which his brother, James Reed Spalding, was one of the editors. As such he attended the noted Southern commercial convention in Savannah, in 1858, where Yancey, Rhett, Barnwell, and DeBow poured out their hot invective. In the following year he mingled with the great Southern leaders on the eve of the great events which were soon to burst upon the country. Doubtless in his law study and in his intercourse with men in different phases of society he acquired that practical acquaintance with human nature which makes available his instinctive and common-sense power of meeting all classes of men.

Flattering offers were made him by Judge Davis to remain and enter into practice with that eminent lawyer at a large assured income. But Mr. Spalding had already changed his purpose for life. He returned North, abandoned the law, and began the study of theology in the Union Theological Seminary in New York City in 1858. Here he remained two years. Here, also, he did regular editorial work on the New York World, of which his brother was founder, and subsequently wrote for the columns of the New York Times. This experience enabled him later to write for five years a large portion of the editorial leaders of the Watchman and Reflector. While in Union Seminary, his spirit of independence and industry was so strong that he supported himself entirely by his literary work. Leaving New York, he entered Andover Theological Seminary, where, after one year's study, he graduated in 1861. On the 5th of October of that year he was ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in Vergennes, Vt., a position to which he had, in fact, been called before his graduation, as well as to another field. He resigned his successful pastorate at Vergennes, Aug. 1, 1864, to accept a call to the Park Church, Hartford, Conn., formerly Dr. Bushnell's, where he was installed September 28th. He resigned that charge and was dismissed March 23, 1869, and was installed pastor of the First Church in Dover, September 1st following.

This church is the second in point of age in this State, being organized in December, 1638, and preceded by Hampton only. The old Exeter First Church itself later became extinct in 1642, and the First Church of Exeter dates from 1698 only. The Dover First Parish dates from October, 1633, and is unquestionably the oldest in New Hampshire. A long line of able men has been on the roll of the pastors of that venerable church. Under none has it been so strong and so influential as under Dr. Spalding. Its numbers have largely increased; its pews are at a constant premium; its pew-occupants number men of the highest distinction in the State. Three years since the whole of the handsome church edifice was refitted at an expense of over twelve thousand dollars, besides the amount necessary to purchase the pew property, and no debt remains. An elegant and commodious parsonage has also been purchased and paid for. Without disparagement to others, it is safe to say that public opinion accords to Mr. Spalding a foremost place among the ministers of New Hampshire. Certainly no pastor of the ancient First Church ever had a greater public respect or a deeper personal affection. His administration of a strong and thinking society goes on without even a ripple. He has been frequently called to attend distant councils, some of great and even national interest, and some where delicate questions required the wisest consideration; and in all cases his calm and deliberate judgment has had an influence inferior to none. One of these was the great Brooklyn Council, of national interest, in 1876.

In his preaching, one has to study him to get the secret of his influence. There is nothing in it to startle. There is no dramatic exhibition. It is the farthest possible from the sensational. There are never any protruding logical bones. He never indulges in any prettinesses of diction. But a critical analysis (the last thing one thinks of in listening to him) reveals the elements of his power. His themes are always elevated themes. One sees the most earnest convictions held in perfect independence and honesty; a natural development of thought in an always fresh and orderly way; a diction as clear as a pellucid brook; illustrations drawn from wide observation, always simple, and frequently beautiful; a genial, sometimes intense, glow pervading his whole discourse; and a dignified but simple manliness throughout. Fully six feet in height, and with liberally developed physique, he impresses one at first mainly with the idea of manly strength. But it takes no great time to see that commanding intellectual abilities are fully parallel with his physique; and those who hear him, and especially those who know him, find an equal development of a generous nature which inclines always to sympathy, and with which he answers, in public and private, to every appeal to his helpful power. In doctrine he is understood to hold the main tenets of what is called old theology, but as forces rather than dogmas, and liberally instead of severely applied.

Mr. Spalding's literary work has been extensive, but mainly upon current newspaper periodicals. This has given him, of course, a valuable directness and clearness of expression. A few sermons and other productions have been published; a sermon on God's Presence and Purpose in the War, Nov. 26, 1863; a discourse commemorative of Gen. Samuel P. Strong, Feb. 28, 1864; a discourse on the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the settlement of Dover, May 18, 1873; a discourse commemorative of the character and career of Hon. John P. Hale, Nov. 27, 1873, which the poet Whittier characterized in the highest terms,—a fine specimen of judicious analysis, in which he does justice to the pioneer of the anti-slavery cause in the United States Senate, a justice now lately apparently purposely ignored out of a desire to magnify a brilliant but later laborer; the Relation of the Church to Children, Nov. 6, 1873; the Dover Pulpit in the Revolution, July 9, 1876, for which he searched and well used the manuscript of his eminent predecessor, Dr. Jeremy Belknap; the fiftieth anniversary of the organization of the Conference of Churches of Strafford County, June 18, 1878; the Idea and Necessity of Normal-School Training, Dec. 26, 1878; Annual Report of the Trustees of the State Normal School, June, 1879; Memorial on the Death of Garfield, September, 1881; historical discourse on the one hundredth anniversary of the Piscataqua Association, Oct. 26, 1881; on the death of Wells Waldron, Nov. 13, 1881; on the death of John Riley Varney, May 5, 1882.

In addition, however, to his other work he has been, and is, the editor of the New Hampshire Journal, a successful weekly in the interest of the Congregational Churches, from which some of his keen editorials have met with favor throughout the country.

Mr. Spalding was a member of the Constitutional Convention of New Hampshire which met Jan. 8, 1877. He represented Dover in the New Hampshire House of Representatives in 1877. He is also a trustee of the State normal school, by appointment of the Governor and Council, his first appointment, for two years, being made in 1876, and his chairmanship of that board commencing soon after and now continuing. He became a member of the school committee of Dover in 1875, and still continues, having been its chairman from 1876. He was chosen trustee and one of the Executive Committee of the New Hampshire Missionary Society in 1873, and still retains each position. He received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from Dartmouth College in 1878.

Dr. Spalding married Sarah Livingston, daughter of Rev. Dr. John W. Olmstead, manager and editor of the Watchman and Reflector; her mother, Mary, was daughter of Richard Montgomery Livingston, a lawyer of Saratoga, N. Y. Their children are Mary Livingston, Martha Reed, Catharine Olmstead (who died Aug. 29, 1881, aged fourteen), Gertrude Parker, and George Brown.

HENRY RUST PARKER, M.D.

The subject of this sketch is of English ancestry, and traces his lineage in this country to William Parker, who emigrated from England in the year 1703 and settled in Portsmouth, N. H. From that time onward members of the Parker family have occupied prominent positions in the councils of the county and State.

The Hon. William Parker, eldest son of the above, was born in Portsmouth in 1703. He was admitted to the bar in 1732, and subsequently held various offices of trust and responsibility. He was clerk of the commissioners who settled the boundary line between New Hampshire and Massachusetts in 1737; was register of probate, judge of admiralty, and for many years the only notary public in the province. He was also judge of the Superior Court. He died April 29, 1781. Of his family, two sons were distinguished citizens of Rockingham County; one, the Hon. William Parker, of Exeter, was for many years judge of the Court of Common Pleas and register of probate, and his brother John was high sheriff of the county, and the first copy of the Declaration of Independence ever received in New Hampshire was read by him from the balcony of the court-house in Portsmouth. He was subsequently marshal of the district of New Hampshire. The third son of Hon. William Parker, of Portsmouth, was Samuel, who in 1804 was consecrated a bishop in the Episcopal Church. Matthew Stanley, the youngest son of William above mentioned, married Anna Rust, daughter of Col. Rust, of Portsmouth, and settled in Wolfborough. Of his children, Henry Rust, the youngest, was the father of John Toppan Parker, father of the subject of this sketch. John Toppan was born in Wolfborough, 1804, and married Sally L. Seavey, a native of Wolfborough. They both died the same year, 1849.

Henry Rust Parker, M.D., son of John Toppan and Sally Seavey, was born in Wolfborough, Jan. 24, 1836. At the age of twelve years he was left an orphan and penniless. He learned the business of making shoes, and continued in it until he had acquired sufficient means to commence a course of education, when he entered the academy in his native town, and subsequently became a tutor in this well-known institution. He was teacher of mathematics and English language, and later at Farmington, where he remained eight years. He pursued the study of his chosen profession with Dr. Luther Pattee, of Wolfborough, now of Manchester, subsequently attending medical courses at Dartmouth, where he graduated in 1865.

Dr. Parker commenced practice in his native town in 1865, at once took a prominent position in the profession, and soon became the acknowledged leading physician in Carroll County, his practice also extending largely into Stratford County. He remained here until 1881, when he removed to Dover, and his present large and lucrative practice is sufficient evidence of his worth as a physician and a citizen. He is studious, energetic, and active, ever keeping abreast with the rapid strides in medical science.

May 16, 1866, Dr. Parker united in marriage with Ella M., daughter of Moses Thompson, Esq., of Wolfborough, and their family consists of three children, viz.: Nathalie Sally, born July 9, 1869; Alberta Thompson, born Oct. 7, 1870; and Henry Rust, born July 19, 1875.

JOSEPH D. GUPPEY.

Information concerning the early ancestors of New England farming families is chiefly gathered from contemporary writings and family tradition. But the Guppies, of a date anterior to the Revolution, were too bold and energetic in character, and found the struggle for life too severe to afford much inclination or time for the keeping of diaries. Indeed, it is more than probable that the ancient men of this name so rejoiced in their vigor and brawn, and experienced such an intense delight in the twofold occupation of husbandmen and fishermen, that the mere sight of pen and ink was distasteful. Therefore little can be said of those who died before the breaking out of hostilities between the colonies and mother-country, except that the girls grew up healthy, intelligent, and deft in all housewife duties, while the swarthy, big-limbed boys lost little time in acquiring man's stature and capacity for toil. Such ancestors could leave no material wealth, but they did bequeath a priceless store of nerve-power and strength of purpose. The pioneer Guppy was an Englishman who came to this country not because of civil or religious persecutions at home, but for the simple reason that new lands and a simple form of government offered attractions to his adventurous spirit. His descendant, Capt. James Guppy, was born in Beverly, Mass., and from boyhood evinced a strong liking for the sea. In the course of time he commanded ships sailing out of Salem and Portsmouth, and for a number of years prior to the breaking out of the Revolution did a large business in the West India and South American trade. When it became certain that hostilities would continue for a long time, Capt. Guppy embarked in privateering. He met with varying success until he was taken prisoner and confined in the old "Jersey" prison-ship. There he endured such hardships and cruelties as would have sufficed to break the strength and will of a less vigorous man. For twenty-seven months he saw the dead taken out every morning, and the deaths occurred, among men exceptionally strong and vigorous, from starvation and every nameable indignity to which men could be subjected. Upon his release and return the government sent him to the friendly French fleet on our coast as a competent and trustworthy pilot, and while at Portsmouth he was the confidential business adviser of Marquis De Vandreuil. When peace was declared he settled on a farm in Dover, which he purchased in 1770, the same now in possession of the family. He died March 7, 1826, aged ninety-three years and six months. John Guppy, son of James, was a successful farmer and lumberman, dying at Dover, April 3, 1855, aged eighty-seven years. John had five sons; two died in early life. The oldest living is Judge Joshua J. Guppy, of Portage City, Wis. He was graduated at Dartmouth, 1843, and was breveted brigadier-general in the late war. The youngest living, Jeremy B., is a quiet and intelligent farmer in Dover.

Joseph Dame Guppy, whose portrait appears herewith, was born in Dover, Feb. 11, 1823. He received a good common-school education, supplemented by a special academic course in mathematics. He inherits the family physique, and is a sound practical man, always ready to give a strong, common-sense opinion upon any subject to which his attention has been called. In early life he succeeded as a school-teacher, and his fellow-citizens have repeatedly shown their confidence in his integrity and ability by placing him in positions of trust and responsibility. Auditor, moderator, school-committeeman, county commissioner, member of the Constitutional Convention, and mayor in 1879-80, he retired from each office with credit and honor.

It may be briefly added that ex-Mayor Guppy is a good type of that useful class of citizens, nowhere found in greater strength than in New England, which always furnishes a safe adviser in critical times or in an emergency or difficulty of any kind.

SUPPLEMENT.

THE following items were received too late for insertion in the body of the work :

DEERFIELD.

John C. Brown and George J. French were elected representatives from this town, March, 1877. 1878, Joseph H. Veasey and Samuel Woodman, under the old Constitution, were elected—two every year—in March. The next under the new Constitution, Samuel C. Danforth was elected.

The Congregationalist Church has been supplied by Rev. Lyman White, September, 1882; the Free-Will Baptist by Edwin Blake, Orin Pitts, and Nathan Lathrop, who is the present pastor. Rev. H. O. Walker has been pastor of the Calvary Baptist Church fifteen years.

James F. Prescott was elected town clerk in 1868, and has been re-elected every year since, except 1878, when Charles E. P. Hoit was elected and held the office one year.

SOMERSWORTH

The First Free-Will Baptist Church of Great Falls was organized Aug. 18, 1828, and consisted of seventeen members,—four men and thirteen women. As the early records are lost, we can only give the names of thirteen of the original members. They are as follows: Jacob Davis, Abraham Andrews, John Clark, Ephraim Curtis, Caroline Stanton, Mary Sweet, Hannah Copp, Susan Nason, Mary G. Doe, Hannah Allen, Olive Goodwin, Emeline Watson, and Abigail Pray.

The church was organized out-doors, in a grove between Elm and Green Streets, a short distance in the rear of the old carpenter-shop which stood where the Somersworth House now stands, and which was then used as a place of worship by the Calvin Baptists. Thus it seems that the organization took place on or very near the place where the house now stands.

Jacob Davis and Abraham Andrews were the first deacons. Before erecting their first house of worship they held their meetings in various places; a short time in one of the factory buildings before the machinery was put in, after that in a house which now stands on a brick basement at the corner of Washington and Court Streets, then in a school-house on Orange Street, and finally in a small frame building erected for the purpose by Jacob Davis, but never finished. It was furnished with temporary seats and a temporary pulpit.

The church was supplied by Rev. Nathaniel Thurston, Rev. Carlton Small, and others until the summer of 1831, when Rev. Samuel Robins took the pastoral charge, and continued his labors till the fall of 1832. Some time before the settlement of Mr. Robins, two young ladies, wearied with the uncertainty of irregular supplies, assumed the whole responsibility of hiring a minister for six months, and paid him out of their own pockets, paying fifty-two dollars each. They were Sally W. Paul and Amy Lord.

The first house of worship belonging to this church was built on Market Street, at a cost of three thousand five hundred dollars. It was dedicated in September, 1831, Rev. Jonathan Woodman preaching the sermon. In March, 1833, Rev. Arthur Caverno became pastor, and continued till the spring of 1836.

He was succeeded by Rev. Jonathan Woodman, who became pastor in the spring of 1835, and continued till the spring of 1838. Near the beginning of his administration, on the 8th of April, 1836, "The First Free-Will Baptist Sunday-School Society" was organized. Rev. Mr. Woodman was succeeded by Rev. Theodore Stevens, who became pastor in April, 1838, and remained one year. The next pastor was Rev. Silas Curtis, who commenced his labors the last Sabbath in August, 1839, and closed them the last Sabbath in July, 1843. In 1844 the present church edifice was erected at a cost of seven thousand dollars, and was dedicated on the 22d of December, 1842, Thanksgiving day. The dedicatory sermon was preached by Rev. Jonathan Woodman. Mr. Curtis was succeeded by Rev. Horace Webber, who remained two years. His successor was Rev. R. Dunn, who became pastor in the spring of 1845, and continued in that relation until September, 1846.

The next pastor was Rev. Nahum Brooks, May 1, 1848, and continued until March, 1853. He was succeeded by Rev. Martin Steer, April 1, 1853. The next pastor was Rev. Daniel P. Cilley, April 15, 1856. He was succeeded by Rev. D. Mott, Oct. 26, 1858. His successor was Rev. A. K. Moulton, April 19, 1860. Rev. J. M. Bailey acted as stated supply after Mr. Moulton resigned.

Rev. A. Lovejoy was called to the pastorate July 12, 1865. He was succeeded by Rev. J. Burnham Davis in the spring of 1869. His successor was Rev.

J. F. Smith, May 29, 1871. Rev. P. W. Perry, who entered upon his labors Sept. 1, 1874, and continued some seven years. During his time of service as pastor the church celebrated its fiftieth anniversary, Mr. Perry delivering the historical address, from which we have been able to glean the above facts. We wish that our space would permit us to copy it entire. Mr. Perry was succeeded by the present pastor, Rev. C. D. Dudley, Dec. 1, 1881.

The First Baptist Church,<sup>1</sup> Great Falls, N. H., was organized by aid of a circuit Nov. 12, 1833. Rev. Abner Flanders was moderator of the council, Rev. Luther Crawford clerk; Rev. Joseph Ballard preached the sermon. The number of constituent members was forty-five, only two of whom are still living and members of the church. The church has been served by the following pastors: Abner Goodale, Benjamin Brierley, Benjamin F. Braybrook, E. R. Bailey, Noah Hooper, C. G. Gurr, Samuel A. Collins, R. G. Seymour, D. D. M. A. Dougherty, W. H. Kling, and D. H. Stoddard since April, 1874, the longest pastorate in the history of the church.

The following have served the church as deacons: Thomas B. Parks, Joseph Ricker, O. W. Austin, Richard Yeaton, Samuel Fielden, James M. Tebbets. Deacons at the present time, Oliver H. Lord, Ansel Chick, and Henry H. Wentworth. Clerks, T. B. Parks, S. A. Collins, C. W. Emerson, and C. E. Goodwin since 1867.

The church has given five men to the ministry, viz.: Ivory M. Thompson, O. P. Fuller, Joseph F. Fielden, George H. Harriman, and Arthur L. Bartlett now preparing for the ministry.

The present house of worship was built and dedicated previous to the formation of the church, but has since been greatly improved. A fine parsonage was built in 1874. The present membership of the church is two hundred and twenty-three.

The Free Press and Journal, now in its seventh volume, is an ably conducted and lively local journal. It is published by Edward O. Lord, and justly merits its present popularity.

The Somersworth Bank was organized in 1855, and the Somersworth National Bank in 1865. The present officers are as follows: Edward Hargraves, president; H. C. Gilpatrick, cashier; Directors, E. Hargraves, E. A. Tibbets, S. S. Chick, William R. Burleigh, L. R. Hersom, W. D. Knapp, C. M. Dorr. Capital, $100,000; surplus, $39,000. Oliver H. Lord was president of this bank until January, 1882, when he declined a re-election, and was succeeded by Edward Hargraves. H. C. Gilpatrick became cashier in December, 1881, having succeeded S. S. Rollins.

HENRY WILSON, LL.D.

Henry Wilson, LL.D., was born in Farmington, N. H., Feb. 16, 1812. When but ten years old, in consequence of the extreme poverty of his parents, he was bound an apprentice to a neighboring farmer until twenty-one years of age. He then removed to Massachusetts, with which commonwealth his history was subsequently associated.

The history of Henry Wilson is so well known that no extended notice is needed in this connection. He first came into the political arena in 1840, when he was elected to the Lower House of the Massachusetts Legislature. He was subsequently State senator, candidate for Governor, chosen United States senator to succeed Edward Everett, and was elected Vice-President of the United States in 1872. He died in the Vice-President's apartments in the Capitol at Washington, Nov. 22, 1875.

SEABROOK.

The Friends.—Among the religious organizations in the different parishes or towns set off from the early settled town of Hampton, none date so far back as the Society of Friends in Seabrook. This society was organized in 1701, ten years before the first colony from the Hampton Congregational Church established itself in Hampton Falls. And the earliest records of Hampton Falls, which then included Seabrook, commencing with 1718, show that the legal position of the Friends was at that time well defined, for in the warrants for the parish-meetings occurs this clause, "Quakers excepted." The period of their bitter persecution had then passed, and we will not here recall it. One of their speakers, a Mrs. Hussey, shared the fate of other inhabitants of Seabrook in a murderous attack by their savage foes.

Their present house of worship was erected in 1765, two years after the old Presbyterian house. In a good state of repair, and possessing the usual appearance of a Friends' meeting-house, it stands near the main road to Newburyport, a short distance beyond the Hampton Falls and Seabrook line.

This society is now quite reduced in numbers, and has had no local speakers since the decease of Mr. and Mrs. Edward Gove, a few years since. Mrs. Gove was a very gifted speaker, and her departure in 1873 was commemorated by the poet Whittier in tender and touching lines. While these good old people commanded the respect of all, their mantle appears to have fallen on none. Their first house of worship was erected in 1703, and stood on the southeast side of the present house until 1818, when it was purchased by Daniel Perreare, and moved to its present location, near Great Hill, in Hampton Falls. It is now owned and occupied by Squire Oliver Eaton, who has recently had it repaired. The "Squire" probably carries as much local history in his head as any man in the State, and it seems quite appropriate that he should be the occupant of this historical building, which is just one hundred years older than himself. This society, with those in Amesbury, West Newbury, Mass., and Epping, N. H., compose what is called "The Seabrook Monthly Meeting," which meets with the Seabrook society in June and November.

The Advent Church. Seabrook, was organized in 1868, with about forty members, and a church edifice erected in the following year. The two active deacons in the society are Amos Felch and Charles Dow.

Attorneys.—The present members of the bar in Stratford County are as follows:

Milton.—E. F. Cloutman.

Farmington.—George N. Eastman, George E. Cochran.

Rochester.—Worcester & Gaffney (Joseph Worcester and Charles B. Gaffney), Cyrus K. Sauborn, Henry Kimball, Daniel J. Parsons, Charles S. Ela.

Southern.—William D. Knapp, Copeland & Edgerly (William J. Copeland, James A. Edgerly), Wells & Burleigh (Christopher H. Wells, William R. Burleigh), George E. Beacham, Rufus W. Nason, Harry V. Moore, Joshua Getchell.

Dover.—Samuel M. Wheeler, Joshua G. Hall, Thomas J. Smith, Frank Hobbs, Calvin Sanders, Carter & Nason (Buel C. Carter, William F. Nason), J. Colby Caverly, Charles S. McLane, John Kivel, Woodman & Whittenore (Charles W. Woodman, Arthur G. Whittenore), Robert G. Pike, Henry H. Hart, Thomas M. Pray.

Franklin Academy.—This institution was incorporated in 1805, on the petition of William K. Atkinson, Henry Mellen, John Wheeler, Oliver Crosby, Joseph Smith, Nathaniel W. Ela, Edmund Sise, William Hale, Abraham Duncum, Amos Cogswell, William Twombly, Ezra Green, and Samuel Hale. The charter was granted "to promote religion, piety, virtue, and morality, and for teaching and instructing youth in the English, Latin, and Greek languages; in writing, music, painting, and the art of speaking; in geography, logic, geometry, mathematics, and such other branches of science as opportunity may present and the trustees hereinafter to be provided shall order and direct." The trustees named in the charter are William K. Atkinson, John Waldron, Henry Mellen, John Wheeler, Oliver Crosby, Daniel Henderson, and Samuel Hale.

Nothing appears to have been done until March 6, 1818, when Daniel Waldron, a descendant of Maj. Richard Walderne, deeded one acre and forty square rods of land to a new set of trustees for the "sum of one hundred and fifty dollars, to me in hand paid by Daniel M. Durell, John Wheeler, William Flagg, Jonathan Locke, Jacob M. Carrier, Moses Hodgdon, and Andrew Peirce, Esqrs., trustees of Franklin Academy, in Dover aforesaid, in trust for the sole use and benefit of the said Franklin Academy forever." This lot of land comprised the present yard, and that on the east of it to Central Street.

tees at Wyatt's Inn (old Dover Hotel), on the following 20th day of July. At this meeting such action was taken as led to the erection of the present academy building, the money to build which was raised by subscription. It was completed and dedicated on Saturday, Dec. 5, 1818. The first term commenced on the following Monday, December 7th, under the instruction of Mr. Andrew Thayer, with such assistants as were needed. John McDuffie, Esq., of Rochester; Hon. Thomas E. Sawyer, of Dover; and Hon. Richard Kimball, of Dover, were among the pupils who joined the school on the first day and remained in it till they graduated.
